SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1932

(Legislative day of Friday, February 5, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 5, 1932:

S. 1291. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Freeport, Fla.; and

S. 2317. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Michigan and Berrien County, or either of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Joseph River.

On February 6, 1932:

S. 2407. An act to authorize the sale of parts of a cemetery reserve made for the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians in Oklahoma.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 9. An act respecting the qualifications of the assessor of the District of Columbia to testify in condemnation proceedings;

S. 2077. An act to relieve the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of certain ministerial duties;

S. 2278. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to reduce the penalty of the bond of the Brazos River Harbor Navigation District, of Brazoria County, Tex., furnished as surety for its doing certain work on the improvement of Freeport Harbor, Tex.;

S. 2406. An act for the relief of Harvey K. Meyer, and for other purposes; and

S. 2684. An act for the relief of F. P. Case.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

EXEMPTION OF BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS FROM BEING ADJUDGED BANKRUPTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the request contained in the resolution of the Senate of February 3, 1932 (the House of Representatives concurring therein), I return herewith Senate bill No. 2199, entitled "An act exempting building and loan associations from being adjudged bankrupts."

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1932.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution to correct errors in the enrollment of Senate bill 2199.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the President pro tempore of the Senate in signing the enrolled bill (S. 2199) entitled "An act exempting building and loan associations from being adjudged bankrupts" be rescinded, and that in the reenrollment of the said bill the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make the following corrections, namely: On page 1 of the engrossed bill, line 8, strike out the comma after the word "except"; on page 1, line 9, insert a comma after the word "association"; and on page 2, line 5, strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I inquire the purpose of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. HASTINGS. In enrolling the bill the word "of" was written instead of "or," and two errors were made in placing commas in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They were typographical errors?

Mr. HASTINGS. They were.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The concurrent resolution does not change the substance of the bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. Not at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to not decrease the appropriation of $125,000,000 per year for Federal aid for highway improvement heretofore made, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented to-day by Mr. BLAINE.)

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the board of managers of the American Bureau of Shipping, of New York, N. Y., favoring the ratification of the convention for the safety of life at sea, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution relating to Federal highway aid

Whereas reports from Washington indicate that serious consideration is being given in Congress to the proposal to reduce the appropriation heretofore made of $125,000,000 for Federal aid for highway improvement; and

Whereas under existing conditions Federal aid should be increased rather than decreased in order to give employment to as many unemployed citizens as possible; and

Whereas any reduction in the Federal highway aids is peculiarly unfair at this time because this State, as well as many other States, has adopted long-time construction programs based upon the Federal appropriations heretofore made, and a reduction now would compel a complete readjustment of these programs with a curtailment of work for which allotments have already been made by the States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to at least not decrease the appropriation of $125,000,000 per year for Federal aid for highway improvement which has been made heretofore; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

HENRY A. HUBER,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHAS. B. PERRY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. COPELAND presented the petition of the faculty and students of Keuka College, of Keuka Park, N. Y., praying for the passage by Congress of a resolution urging the American delegates to the Geneva Disarmament Conference to work for an international agreement reducing military expenditures of all governments by at least 25 per cent, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Flushing Peace Society, of New York, favoring the maintenance of peace and avoidance of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of the Potter Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Penn Yan, N. Y., praying for a reduction in armaments in 1932 and favoring world disarmament, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying that the United States may not become involved in war in the Far East, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by citizens of Michigan in mass meeting assembled at Detroit, Mich., favoring revision of the treaty of Versailles, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jamestown, N. Y., and vicinity, praying for the imposition of a tariff on crude oil and its products, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Parliament of Community Councils (Inc.), of New York City, N. Y., favoring the immediate awarding of contracts for Federal projects heretofore authorized, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented the memorial of the Schuyler County Rural Letter Carriers Association, of Watkins Glen, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 2490, placing the Rural Free Delivery Service on a contract basis, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented two petitions of sundry citizens of Bowling Green, Ky., praying for the passage of legislation granting pensions to ex-slaves, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of East Aurora, Deposit, East Rochester, Himrod, and Penn Yan, all in the State of New York, praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Niagara Falls (N. Y.) Central Labor Union, of the American Federation of Labor, favoring the passage of Senate bill 935, restricting the issuance of restraining orders or temporary or permanent injunctions in cases involving labor disputes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

RELIEF OF DEPOSITORS OF CLOSED BANKS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I present a letter from Mr. W. J. Williams, of Leland, Miss., in the nature of a petition, relating to the relief of depositors in closed banks. Let me say that, in answer to the letter of Mr. Williams, I have explained that it is not possible for the Government, through any process of liquidation with which I am familiar, to pay the depositors of closed banks in full. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LELAND, MISS., December 7, 1930.

Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As a depositor having the greater part of his life's savings tied up in the closed National Bank of Arkansas, Pine Bluff, Ark., which institution closed about July 21, this year, I am wondering if some plan could not be worked out by the United States Government to take over the frozen assets of the closed bank and liquidate over a period of several years, the money advanced by the Government on the frozen assets to be used in liquidation of the defunct bank.

It seems to me that there is nothing the Government could do that would more quickly bolster up confidence than to liquidate, in a way that would make the depositors whole, these national banks that have been closed on account of frozen farm loans and by depositors' runs since June 1 this year. If my information is correct, much of the depositors' money in these closed banks was used to finance agriculture.

It would appear that nothing is to be left undone to help the farmer, which is indeed commendable. I am thinking also of the unorganized clerical and others, some of whom have their all tied up in a defunct bank. More especially am I thinking of those of the clerical class who are out of work; have reached the age when they are not wanted, regardless of their ability.

I, like many other depositors, had utmost confidence in a national bank, not on account of the management but because of Federal supervision. Having this confidence account of Federal supervision, the failure of the National Bank of Arkansas, Pine Bluff, Ark., came as a clap of thunder out of a clear sky. Those depositors who kept the faith and were caught unawares are holding the bag. I have been told that the National Bank of Arkansas, Pine Bluff, Ark., was examined three or four times the last year of its operation. If this be true, the examiner should have been pretty well informed of the bank's condition. This bank has been in hands of Federal receiver for four or five months, who no doubt is doing the very best he can to protect all concerned. And for the interest of all concerned, I trust it will not be a long-drawn-out affair on account of the expense of liquidation.

I understand that the National Bank of Arkansas had something like 4,800 depositors, all of whom, I am sure, will join me in thanking you to do anything in your power to make them whole in their deposits. I do not expect unreasonable things, and may be wrong in the suggestion contained in first paragraph of this letter, but you know how a fellow must feel with most of his money tied up in a closed bank and he out of work.

I feel at liberty in bringing this matter to your attention, as I am a former resident of Arkansas and am now figuring on returning to Pine Bluff.

With wishes for your continued success,
Yours very truly,

W. J. WILLIAMS.

MUSCLE SHOALS—ARTICLE BY JUDSON KING

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article by Judson King, director of the National Popular Government League, which is a complete analysis of the report made by President Hoover's commission on Muscle Shoals.

The power question will be a vital issue in the next presidential campaign unless the Power Trust is able, as it is endeavoring to do, to stop Governor Roosevelt from securing the Democratic nomination.

The Power Trust is, Mr. President, probably the most powerful nonpartisan political organization in the United States to-day, and, wittingly or unwittingly, many people are lending themselves to the movement to stop Roosevelt, thereby aiding the power interests in their attempt to control the Democratic Party.

This analysis by the National Popular Government League shows how, by artful propaganda, an attempt has been made to mislead Congress in regard to Muscle Shoals.

I desire to read a short statement by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in which he said:

This bulletin, prepared by Judson King at my request, is a complete answer to and analysis of the report of President Hoover's so-called Muscle Shoals Commission and of the propaganda put out by the Power Trust to bring about the enactment into law of the bill proposed by that commission.

It shows the absolute fallacy as well as the incorrect and misleading deductions made by the commission and the sustaining opinion rendered by Colonel Tyler. Incidentally, it also annihilates the arguments made by President Hoover in his message vetoing the Muscle Shoals bill which passed the last Congress.

G. W. NORRIS.

I ask that this article by Mr. Judson King may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, is it so ordered.

The article is as follows:

THE PROPAGANDA REPORT OF THE NEW MUSCLE SHOALS COMMISSION

(Introduction by Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS)

This bulletin, prepared by Judson King at my request, is a complete answer to and analysis of the report of President Hoover's so-called Muscle Shoals Commission, and of the propaganda put out by the Power Trust to bring about the enactment into law of the bill proposed by that commission.

It shows the absolute fallacy as well as the incorrect and misleading deductions made by the commission and the sustaining opinion rendered by Colonel Tyler. Incidentally, it also annihilates the arguments made by President Hoover in his message vetoing the Muscle Shoals bill which passed the last Congress.

G. W. NORRIS.

When President Hoover, in his veto message on the Norris Muscle Shoals bill last March proposed a new commission to investigate the Shoals question once more a smile went around. After 10 years of exhaustive study and debate, this was just too much.

When the commission was appointed the smile broadened. It was directed, first of all, to work out a plan "for the purpose of quantity production of fertilizers." The outstanding member was Edward A. O'Neal, appointed by the President himself, "to represent agriculture." Mr. O'Neal is president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, with headquarters at Chicago. Back in 1921-22 the Chicago Board of Trade put up $100,000 to start this organization and claims to be its godfather. It has played hand-in-glove with big business ever since in respect to power, as well as other matters. The Senate lobby committee last year discovered Mr. O'Neal had for years been actively cooperating with the Power Trust lobby in Washington against the Norris bills.

Mr. Hoover also appointed a lawyer and an electrical engineer from the War Department. The other six members of the commission were selected by Governors Horton, of Tennessee, and Miller, of Alabama, both elected by the political machines of the power interests, and Judge S. F. Hobbs, chairman, was Miller's campaign manager. Manifestly, the conclusions of the commission were foreordained. (In a bulletin issued July 22, 1931, a "Who's Who" of this commission is given. It also contains an article by Judge Allen J. Roulhac, of Sheffield, Ala., on "How the Alabama Power Co. secured the passage [in the State legislature] of a resolution supporting Hoover's proposal for a Muscle Shoals commission." Published by this league.)

When the President made public the report of his commission on November 19, the smiles changed to chuckles and then to laughter. It is not a pleasing task to report this. We Americans have an inherent respect for the presidential office, but we also have a sense of humor, which even a presidential pronouncement can not overawe. The reason for the merriment lies in this:

SAME OLD FERTILIZER JOKERS

For 10 years the farmers of the Nation have been told and believed that cheap fertilizer was possible at Muscle Shoals, which would cut their bills in half. But no private bid would guarantee it—there has been a "joker" in all such bids, so glaring as to cause even conservative Congressmen to declare them fraudulent. Hoover, however, continues to proclaim the fiction. Hence the first conclusion of his commission is that the shoals should be used "primarily for the production of types of commercial fertilizer," which is right pleasing to the ear. But appended to the press release of November 19, in response to an inquiry by the commission, is an official statement, approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, Arthur M. Hyde, made by Dr. Henry G. Knight and his experts in the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils, that "there seems to be no advantage to the farmers to be gained by operating the property for nitrogen production." (That is, fertilizer.)

This is exactly what Senator NORRIS has held for years amidst abuse and condemnation, and now even Secretary Hyde takes the same position. But why the commission should append that kind of a memorandum, contradicting its chief recommendation, is a mystery. It is a further mystery why Secretary Hyde's statement is omitted from the report of the commission sent to Congress on December 17 by the President with a message.

As to fertilizer, the specific "recommendations" of the commission to lease the Shoals preferably to "a corporation exclusively owned and controlled by organizations of farmers" contains the chief jokers which have caused succeeding Congresses to reject private bids. President Hoover last March vetoed the Norris Muscle Shoals bill which gave the President the right to lease the shoals properties for the production of fertilizer on any terms he desired and guaranteed his lessee receiving power at cost to any extent, provided they would make fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients and that only, but not control of the surplus power. That bill, as Senator NORRIS says, "called their bluff and the Power Trust wolf was shorn of his farmer cloak." Hoover vetoed the bill. His new commission confirms his veto and has added nothing of consequence to a solution of the problem.

REPORT WILL PLEASE THE POWER TRUST

It is manifest that the commission itself regards power as a paramount issue in the Muscle Shoals problem, but its report on this phase of the question, together with the engineering data submitted, might just as well have been written by the publicity section of the National Electric Light Association and saved the Government that expense. There is in existence a flood of accurate engineering and financial data on Muscle Shoals, public and private. For 10 years the Agricultural Committee of the Senate and the Military Affairs Committee of the House have been collecting at great expense information on this subject. The best known impartial experts have appeared before these committees, in addition to witnesses of the private interests and organizations.

HOUSE DOCUMENT NO. 328—A $1,000,000 REPORT IGNORED

In addition, in response to a House resolution, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army caused to be made a comprehensive survey of the Tennessee River Basin. This report was transmitted by Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, to Secretary of War Hurley, and by him to Congress on March 24, 1930. It is entitled "Tennessee River and Tributaries * * * Covering Navigation, Flood Control, Power Development, and Irrigation." It was printed as House Document 328, makes a volume of 734 pages, to which is added a supplement of 198 maps and charts. Its production, which took several years of work, cost the Government $1,106,315. It deals specifically and extensively with flood control, with navigation, with Muscle Shoals power, and the power possibilities of the entire Tennessee River Basin. It contains all the information a statesman needs to have to guide his policies in respect to this problem. It is scientific. It is not propaganda. It is fatal to the veto message.

Hence all this engineering data had little value for the purposes of the President or his commission. So the commission propounded two questions, already answered in No. 328, to the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, which were, in effect:

1. Can the Government operate the electrical plant at Muscle Shoals and sell energy successfully?

2. If not, what annual rental should the Government receive if it leases the plant to a private company?

Lieut. Col. M. C. Tyler was detailed to make answer. That was quite natural. The colonel was formerly in charge of Muscle Shoals, and from March, 1929, to July, 1931, was chief engineer of the Federal Power Commission, where he worked in harmony with and was principal adviser to F. E. Bonner, then executive secretary of the Power Commission, as well as with Acting Chairman Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior.

As is well known, Bonner resigned his position after his conduct in office had been exposed to the public in both House and Senate committees and had become a national scandal. In a deposition taken in San Francisco recently in connection with a libel suit he has brought against the San Francisco Examiner, Bonner, under oath, testified that he had worked in closest cooperation with Colonel Tyler. His reliance on Tyler was so often repeated that the examining attorney exclaimed:

"Q. Say, who ran the job of executive secretary? Did you or did Tyler do it? * * * Did Tyler tell you what to do and what not to do?—A. I relied on his judgment to a very considerable extent; yes, sir."

Tyler and Bonner were a unit in opposition to Charles A. Russell, solicitor of the Power Commission, who charged them with attempting to evade the power act in the interest of the power companies. Russell's discharge by the present Power Commission, headed by Dr. George Otis Smith, created another national scandal. These facts are noted here because Colonel Tyler's record shows him not only against public ownership but against regulation, as provided in the Federal power act.

But President Hoover and evidently his new commissioners have an uncanny faculty of picking experts who will demonstrate what they want demonstrated.

It must be admitted that, with this new job wished on him after his battles in the Power Commission, the colonel was in about as tight a fix as Colonel Whittlesey, of the Lost Battalion fame, at Chateau-Thierry. In his front was House Document 328, above noted, made by his Chief of Engineers. In his rear was a presidential veto of the Norris Muscle Shoals bill containing engineering estimates approved by the Commander in Chief of the United States Army, Mr. Hoover, whose findings were in violent conflict with those of the Chief of Engineers in House Document 328. On his right flank was the Power Trust army, which had to be kept quiet, and on his left flank were the Senate and House progressives of both parties, led by Senator NORRIS, flushed with campaign victories and ready for action.

Colonel Tyler's report is an outstanding demonstration of what a heroic Army engineer can do in times of peace. Summarized in simple language, Colonel Tyler advised the commission:

"1. No; it is not feasible for the Government to operate Muscle Shoals. Seven major power companies now occupy the field and sell current at very low rates; they give more dependable service than the Government can give, and that is the main thing; the cities and towns down there can have public ownership now of distributing systems and buy cheap wholesale current from the private companies, but they don't do it; besides which, the State laws are against them; they are deeply in debt and can not afford to buy current of the Government, even if they desired.

"If we discount idle theory and get down to reality, Uncle Sam will be in the 'red' around $23,000,000 by 1946 if we attempt to compete with the private companies.

"2. As a rental proposition, that depends. If you lease the hydrosteam plant at Wilson Dam, as now installed, to the power companies, it would not be worth much to them for about five years; after that I estimate you should charge an annual rental of $1,595,000.

"If you build the Cove Creek storage dam upstream, you will greatly increase the prime power at Wilson Dam, and you should charge the companies an 'ultimate rental' of $2,185,000.

"Eight generating units are now installed at Wilson Dam. There is room in the power house for 10 more, but under present low market conditions it would be 'unsound even to install one additional unit,' so I won't figure on that." (See commission's report, pp. 91–94.)

It is first to be noted that Colonel Tyler forecasts a ridiculously low annual rental of $1,595,000 "in about five years," with the implication that it is worth nothing much to the power companies in the meantime, and that this figure closely approximates the rental offered by the Power Trust in 1927, which offer President Coolidge urged Congress to accept. It was $600,000 for the first 6 years, $1,200,000 for the next 6 years, $1,500,000 for the next 6 years, and $2,000,000 thereafter. The 13 allied power companies of the South making this bid were practically all controlled by Electric Bond & Share, of New York, which is still after the shoals and whose leading men are heavy campaign contributors.

But the Army engineers of House Document No. 328, before described, also estimated rentals. At page 528 they recommend that the Government should receive an annual income from the hydrosteam plant at Wilson Dam, as now installed, of $2,535,278.

This plant, they say, when fully installed and all the power taken, should have an annual rental of $5,764,000.

Of course, there is a mass of technical data, tables, qualifications, ifs, ands, and buts in both set-ups difficult enough for a practical engineer to untangle. However, out of the maze two or three governing points emerge very clearly which the common man can understand.

Colonel Tyler and the President's commission view the problem from the standpoint of what private companies will do and propose to contract away Muscle Shoals current at around 2 mills per kilowatt-hour for primary power and 1 mill for secondary power.

The engineers of Document No. 328, more statesmenlike, consider the future, take cognizance of the vast amount of power which can be generated, and recommend 4.67 mills per kilowatt-hour for primary and 2 mills per kilowatt-hour for secondary power as a fair wholesale price private companies should pay. Incidentally, they talk about nine months of secondary power, while Hoover and Tyler speak of seven months.

In Document No. 328 the engineers do not give a definite estimate of rental value with Cove Creek storage regulation. They do give, however, an estimate of the ultimate composite power which can be developed with the hydro-steam plant at Muscle Shoals, more fully installed, interconnected with a hydroplant at Cove Creek with full regulation of the stream flow above and below Wilson Dam; also the switchboard cost of generating this power and of delivering it over high-tension transmission lines at various distances up to 350 miles. The figures are startling. (Doc. No. 328, p. 527.) Some outstanding results are:

Total prime power which will be for sale:

In round figures, 3,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

After providing for interest on the entire investment at 4 per cent for amortization, for depreciation, and operation—in short, all costs to Uncle Sam—the composite power can be delivered at the switchboard for $20.78 per kilowatt, or $15.50 per horsepower, and sold at the end of a transmission line 350 miles away for $31.10 per kilomatt, or $23.10 per horsepower.

Again, it is demonstrated (p. 531) that regulated hydrosteam power, without Cove Creek, can be transmitted 350 miles and sold at 4.5 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Any layman can figure it out that if this power should be sold at even 4 miles per kilowatt-hour, it would be sufficient to relieve American taxpayers of any burden because it would yield an annual revenue of $12,000,000.

It is evident that Tyler and the commission are very tender toward the private companies. Their rentals are much below those of nonpolitical engineers and experts.

NEITHER CONSIDER THE ULTIMATE CONSUMER

Note sharply at this juncture, however, that none of those Army engineers has been asked to estimate what this vast bulk of power is worth to the people of the South—the ultimate consumers—if sold under the provisions of the Norris bill. There is no regard to retail values. The War Department's assumption, doubtless under direction from above, is that Government power in the entire Tennessee Valley, including power sites, is to be turned over to private companies.

What this power is worth to the people under public operation throughout would reach a fabulous figure and is a subject for a separate bulletin.

ENGINEERING VISION

With magnificent vision the engineers producing the report presented in No. 328 deal with the problems of flood control, navigation, and power development of the Tennessee River as an engineering unit. They demonstrate the close interrelation of these projects and that "economic waste" can be avoided by working them out together under one comprehensive plan, which only the Federal Government is powerful enough to undertake.

This is exactly what Senator NORRIS and some of his colleagues have been proclaiming on the Senate floor for years. But the Senator has declared also that by selling power developed in connection with dams for flood control and navigation the whole enterprise could be financed without $1 being taken from the pockets of the American taxpayer, while putting millions of dollars into the pockets of power users in the Southland. To that proposition Electric Bond & Share, of New York says, "No"; if you touch power, you can't have flood control or navigation!"

Here is a concrete issue for reconstruction economists and national and regional "planners" to try their hands on—but will they?

HOW TYLER MAKES THE GOVERNMENT LOSE MONEY ON PAPER

Colonel Tyler's memorandum, Cost to the Federal Government of Transmitting and Selling Muscle Shoals Power, is found at pages 61 to 76 of the commission's report. He shows his Power Trust bias by employing propaganda lingo throughout. He begins:

"If the Government should decide to embark in the public-utility power business * * * at Muscle Shoals, it is assumed that its purpose would be to reduce the price of power generally in the adjacent territory by selling wholesale and at cost in direct competition with the existing public-utility companies."

He constantly refers to the private power companies as "the public utilities," as if to imply that a publicly operated plant was not a public utility. This bias crops out even in his final table, where one column of figures is headed "Deficit on Government Power Business," to demonstrate which was doubtless the main purpose of his selection by the commission and the appointment of the commission by the President.

He asserts that "in such competition the Government would have three great advantages, viz, lower interest rates on borrowed money, freedom from taxation on real property and on incomes, and no necessity for profit." He continues: "These advantages should enable the Government to sell at low prices. However, the cost of the power would depend * * * on the extent and location of the market for power, the investment in generating and transmission facilities and maintenance and operating cost."

This is a fair and consistent statement of the case, but when he proceeds to estimate "the market for the Government power," we are at once given a clue to the methods by which conclusions are to be reached which will sustain the President's veto message of the Norris bill.

WHY 200 MILES LIMIT? SHOULD BE 350 MILES

We read, "It is assumed that power will be sold in the area east of the Mississippi River and south of the Ohio River and within 200 miles of Muscle Shoals. Portions of five States compose this area, viz, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi."

Why 200 miles? The colonel does not explain. He asserts. Turn now to House Document 328, page 520, and we find the nonpolitical engineers laying down 350 miles as the transmission radius. This includes, of course, Tyler's area, but note the significant language they use:

"Of this territory the greatest shortage of hydropower exists in the southern parts of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in the eastern parts of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and in the States of Mississippi and Kentucky."

Areas largely outside the colonel's area.

Tyler appends a map with his 200-mile radius. Engineer Wright also appends a map (plate 182, Corps of Engineers, United States Army) with his 350-mile radius.

Within Colonel Tyler's area of 125,648 square miles are six large cities—Birmingham, Montgomery, Chattanooga, Nashville, Memphis, and Atlanta. Now Atlanta is actually less than 200 miles from Muscle Shoals, and even the colonel's circle runs through it on his own map, but for some reason he says: "Atlanta is eliminated on account of the distance from the generating stations." Out of all this he assumes that only two cities will buy power from the Government by 1946.

Look now at Engineer Wright's map: In his area of 385,347 square miles we find within transmission distance from Muscle Shoals a dozen or more large cities. Some of them are St. Louis, Indianapolis, Evansville, Cincinnati, Frankfort, Louisville, Knoxville, Asheville, Charlotte (S. C.), Atlanta, Macon, Montgomery, New Orleans, Jackson, Meridian, Little Rock, Hot Springs, and Pine Bluff—home of Harvey C. Couch.

This, then, is the real area, the power rates of which will be profoundly affected by Government operation of Muscle Shoals with authority to build long-distance transmission lines. This area exceeds many times in wealth, population, industry, and farm cultivation the contracted area "assumed" by Colonel Tyler and the commission.

If the reader distrusts the accuracy of this layman writer, read a paragraph from the hard-headed Army engineers, who worked in relative freedom:

"Referring to Chart II, it will be seen that a circle having a radius of 350 miles passes near Dayton, Ohio, falls a few miles short of Indianapolis, Ind.; Springfield, Ill.; Springfield, Mo.; Alexandria and New Orleans, La.; Tallahassee, Fla.; and Williamson, W. Va. Less than the west half of this circle will afford a market for all the power that can be produced at Wilson Dam."

THE COLONEL'S PRIVATE COMPANIES' LOW RATES

Having fixed his sales territory to suit himself, Colonel Tyler next informs us that it is now amply served by "seven major public-utility companies." He always dodges the words "private companies." He expands upon the "magnitude" of their plants, transmission systems, and investments without mention of inflated securities or control by the Electric Bond & Share Co. of New York, political supporter of President Hoover and Governor Miller, of Alabama, and Governor Horton, of Tennessee. He boasts of their "dependable service" and in general implies that it would be a sort of crime to annoy them with public competition. He is to be thanked for not designating such competition as "un-American" or "communistic," showing that he has a sense of humor as to terminology, if not as to facts.

His "dependability" turns, of course, upon the interconnection of private companies and he blandly assumes the Government would have no such stand-by service. He forgets that public and private systems can readily have interconnected lines for mutual emergency help in case service is interrupted by storms, lightning, fires, or what not. Some city systems and private companies are now so connected. But a political engineer must be pardoned for such oversights. At that, he probably knows that the Muscle Shoals plant has not been out of commission once since it began generating current on September 12, 1925.

But it is when he comes to demonstrate the "low rates" which the people of Alabama and other States now enjoy at the hands of these private companies that the colonel's courage and dash as a statistician challenge admiration.

He has been ordered to place an imposing Hoover Power Trust camouflage structure at an exposed point. Disregarding danger, he borrows one and sets it up, thus:

"The average sale price of power in this territory is low, particularly when the low density of population and the long transmission distances are considered. This is shown by the following comparisons:

Average receipts per kilowatt-hour for 1929

	Cents
Alabama Power Co. (state-wide distribution)	1.22
City of Tacoma (municipally owned system)	1.035
City of Seattle (municipally owned system)	1.806
City of Cleveland (municipally owned system)	2.373

This Q. E. D. set-up will not disconcert gunners in the progressive ranks. It is quite familiar. It is taken direct from an Alabama Power Co. propaganda pamphlet, issued in March, 1928, written by Thomas W. Martin, president of that company, in an effort to prove that his company was selling power to ultimate consumers cheaper than the combined output of seven large American city plants whose total load about equaled his own. Martin included Tacoma, Seattle, Cleveland, Jacksonville, Fla., Johnstown, Pa., Springfield, Ill., and Los Angeles. The set-up was printed in full page advertisements in Alabama newspapers; the pamphlet was broadcast nationally and sent to Members of Congress. Now note the trick. What neither General Martin nor Colonel Tyler has had the fairness to state is the fact that to get this low "average" of 1.22 cents per kilowatt-hour, they include nearly one-half of the entire output of the Alabama Power Co. which is sold at from 5 to 7 mills per kilowatt-hour, wholesale, to the Georgia Power Co. and other companies for resale at the usual high retail rates of from 5 to 10 cents per kilowatt-hour, whereas all but a very small part of the output of these municipal plants is sold direct to ultimate consumers. That is, Tyler and Martin compare private wholesale rates largely with public retail rates, exactly as does Mr. Floyd B. Carlisle, of the Niagara-Hudson Corporation, when comparing "average" costs as between Ontario and western New York State.

Such tactics are to be expected from Power Trust executives, lobbyists, and writers. They are not in order at the hands of an Army engineer, a presidential commission, or a President, presumably servants of the American people, whose salaries are met from public funds.

The duplicity of such methods is exposed when we examine the actual average prices paid in 1929 by the different classes of consumers in Alabama. Here is a proper set-up, compiled by I. F. McDonnell, chief engineer of the Alabama Public Service Commission:

Alabama Power Co. operating revenue, 1929

(Analyzed by the Alabama Public Service Commission)

	Revenue	Kilowatt-hour sales	Per kilowatt-hour
			Cents
Residential service	$2,273,413.65	40,857,000	5.56
Commercial service	3,102,371.43	63,954,000	4.85
Rural service	133,781.46	1,529,000	8.75
Sign and window lighting	44,815.73	785,000	5.71
Street lighting	318,423.25	5,694,000	5.59
Industrial power	6,817,624.24	668,854,417	1.02
Other electric companies	4,664,923.58	652,047,341	.72
Total sales of current	17,355,353.34	1,433,721,080	1.21

These differences of actual cost as between large and small consumers appear more startling from another division prepared by the commission's engineers. Under "Wholesale" is included lump power sold for resale, current sold extremely large industrial concerns at low rates, and current sold to municipalities for resale. Under "Retail" are included ordinary industrial, residential, store, farm, street-lighting, and like customers.

Sales of Alabama Power Co. as divided between wholesale and retail business, 1929

	Total revenue	Total sales, kilowatt-hours	Average cost, kilowatt-hour
			Cents
Wholesale	$11,482,547.82	1,320,901,758	0.87
Retail	5,872,805.52	112,819,322	5.20

So that ordinary retail consumers who use less than 8 per cent of the company's output but supply 34 per cent of its revenues come out from behind Colonel Tyler's "average" of 1.22 cents, paying over 5 cents per kilowatt-hour and the big fellows less than 1 cent. All of which supplies illuminating comment on Colonel Tyler's statistical methods and reminds us of Disraeli's definition.

Since the colonel has attempted to disparage public plants by his comparisons, let us look at a similar table showing such average costs for the city of Tacoma in 1929. Tables from the other cities would yield comparable results, but our space is limited. These data are taken from the very complete official report of the light division of the department of public utilities for the city of Takoma, Wash., for 1929:

City of Tacoma, light division (operating revenue 1929, pp. 53–57)

	Revenue	Kilowatt-hour sales	Average per kilowatt-hour	As against Alabama average
			Cents	Cents
Residential and commercial	$1,254,416	69,165,512	1.80	5.56
Industrial power	731,086	114,609,286	.64	1.02
Street lighting	109,908	6,346,577	1.73	5.59
Other utilities	161,235	20,060,000	.80	.72
Municipal power	23,246	2,670,602	.80

Concerning the last two columns above, it appears that Alabama housewives pay more than three times as much for service as Tacoma women; merchants, in the same ratio; manufacturers and power users, twice as much; and taxpayers, three times as much for street lighting.

SEATTLE'S "CITY LIGHT"

Tacoma has long had a virtual monopoly, but "City Light" in Seattle has competed with the Puget Sound Light & Power Co., controlled by the Stone-Webster interests of Boston.

Starting from nothing in 1905, City Light has steadily grown and now has over one-half of the business. Its rates, however, are not so high as one would expect. Average costs per kilowatt-hour in 1929 were: Domestic, 2.89 cents; stores, etc., 2.02 cents; industrial, 1.09 cents; street lighting, 2.24 cents.

Step by step City Light has lowered its rates, to be promptly met by the company. They were always the same.

President Hoover opposes the Norris Muscle Shoals plan because, he says, private companies now occupy the field and public competition would be "economic waste." That's true—from an engineer's viewpoint solely. But war is war. Regulation doesn't regulate. Seattle went into the power business in competition with individual initiative to get cheap electric service. Lenin, of Moscow, was then an exile in Switzerland and presumably had little influence in Seattle.

Now, how has this "economic waste" affected Seattle? I recently asked some questions of Supt. J. D. Ross, the able engineer who built and manages the plant. Yes; it is the same Mr. Ross that Mayor Edwards discharged last year as a first step toward wrecking the plant, and was promptly recalled by the voters of Seattle for his treachery. Here are the questions and answers in brief, fully sustained by official records:

"Q. How much money did the customers of both the private and the public plants in Seattle save last year by reason of competition by City Light?—A. Ten million dollars, based on average national rates.

"Q. Give some estimate as to how much they have saved since City Light started.—A. Conservatively, $90,000,000 in the past 27 years.

"Q. How much, if any, of your net revenues have been reinvested in the plant which a private company would have distributed as profits?—A. Twenty million dollars.

"Q. Do you save the taxpayers any money on street lighting?—A. Indeed we do; $375,000 last year, as against what we would have paid a private company.

"Q. Do you pay taxes?—A. No; but interest on bank deposits go to the general fund—$60,000 just now.

"Q. Could you reduce your rates if you had a monopoly in the city?—A. Yes; by one-third. I could then sell domestic current at from 1 cent to 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour."

On reflection, it is scarcely probable that the Seattle people regard City Light as an "economic waste."

STATE-WIDE DISTRIBUTION DOES NOT EXPLAIN

At this point the colonel and other critics may object that the comparison is unfair, as the Alabama company has state-wide distribution. In Seattle and Tacoma it is local. Fair enough. The Alabama Power Co. is a huge private superpower system. The only public superpower system on the continent with which to compare it is Ontario Hydro. Costs in Tacoma and Ontario are strikingly similar. In 1929, at Windsor, opposite Detroit, 250 miles from Niagara Falls, domestic consumers paid an average of only 1.6 cents per kilowatt-hour. On top of that, the surplus was so great that all consumers had returned to them for a Christmas present a check amounting to 10 per cent of their bills for the entire year.

If Alabama hydro consumers had paid Ontario hydro rates in 1929

Character of service	Total kilowatt-hours sold by Alabama Co.	Total paid to Alabama Co.	Total if paid at average Ontario rates	Per kilowatt-hour average, Alabama Co.	Per kilowatt-hour average, Ontario Hydro
				Cents	Cents
Residential	40,857,000	$2,273,413	$682,311	5.56	1.67
Commercial	63,954,000	3,102,371	1,381,406	4.85	2.16
Industrial power	668,854,417	6,817,624	3,812,467	1.02	.57
Street light	5,694,000	318,423	129,252	5.59	2.27

There is no help for Colonel Tyler's commission here.

FARM RATES

Colonel Tyler assures us that Alabama farmers, as well as town people, enjoy cheap electric rates. He says, page 66: "The average revenue per kilowatt-hour was 4.67 cents" for farm service in 1930. The colonel has been misinformed by some one. The Alabama Public Service Commission reports the average cost in 1930 to be 6.95 cents per kilowatt-hour, or 49 per cent higher than the colonel's figure. But neither figure can be called "low." The fact is, in Alabama or elsewhere, farmers can never expect really cheap electric service from private companies.

But since the President's commission is devoted to agriculture their attention is called to the unbelievably low rates in the farm district adjacent to Tacoma, which enjoys the benefit of this public plant. A letter from Hon. Homer T. Bone, counsel for the port of Tacoma, informs us that for miles around Tacoma the farmers have organized mutual nonprofit companies which buy power wholesale from the Tacoma system. There are about 3,000 farmers in these companies. They built their own lines, which cost around $600 per mile. The rates of the Elmhurst Mutual Co. are typical of them all. They are 5 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 20 kilowatt-hours and 1 cent per kilowatt-hour for all additional.

Mr. Bone writes that Mr. ———, a member of this company, owns a large chicken farm. In one month he used 13,000 kilowatt-hours. His bill was $130.80, or 1 cent per kilowatt-hour. In Alabama he would have paid $273.50.

True, this is an exceptionally large customer, but campaign orators and writers proclaiming "a chicken in every pot" should take notice. Most of these companies have long since paid off their original investment out of earnings and have no interest charges to meet. Alabama farmers will go on paying interest and dividends on "capital investment" as long as the company owns the lines.

REGARDING TAXES

Everywhere and always where a public plant is proposed private company propagandists warn the people about taxes. Hoover does, and Tyler follows suit. Public plants do not pay taxes. That explains their low rates. Private companies pay taxes and are public benefactors.

Unfortunately for the argument, the Tacoma plant does pay taxes—7 per cent of its gross revenue, which works out to 0.7 mill per kilowatt-hour. President Martin, of the Alabama Power Co., in 1929 paid for total taxes 1.1 mills per kilowatt-hour, as reported by the Federal Trade Commission investigation (vol. 30, p. 214). That 1 mill for taxes does not explain why Alabama domestic consumers paid over 5 cents per kilowatt-hour in that year and Tacoma consumers less than 2 cents per kilowatt-hour.

THE COLONEL'S "PRACTICABLE OUTPUT" VERSUS THE REAL MARKET

The colonel fixes the "practicable output" of the hydrosteam plant at Muscle Shoals at "about 442,000,000 kilowatt-hours," as at present installed. Add Cove Creek, and it will be "about 992,000,000 kilowatt-hours." This is figured on the load factor of the seven private companies now operating in that region. He concludes that Government sales "probably will be much less than 1,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours per annum for many years" (p. 63). These figures are far below estimates by other Army engineers, as previously noted. The colonel is sad over his prospective market. Not so sad are companies trying to lease the plant.

The trouble with most Army engineers and engineers serving private companies—and this layman has talked with scores of them—in this respect is that they have no conception or knowledge of what cheap rates will do to a "load factor." They are seemingly unaware that a power plant can sell from two to three times more current to retail customers at 2 cents per kilowatt-hour than they can at the Power Trust's high rates of 6 or 7 cents. The average home in Alabama buys only around 50 kilowatt-hours per month, which is about the national average. Tacoma's average is 116 and Seattle over 100 kilowatt-hours per month. The average for Ontario in 1929 was 122 kilowatt-hours per month, including even the hamlets and small towns. Hence there is an enormous market for cheap domestic current in the Southland effected by Muscle Shoals, now untouched by the Power Trust because of its high rates.

REFRIGERATION NEEDS

The South with its hot climate is in special need of cheap electric refrigeration, also electric cooking and hot-water heating—all three matters of health and comfort, to say nothing of washing and ironing and house work all over this hot region. The market is there at 1 or 2 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Industrial current at one-half or one-third the prices now charged by the Power Trust is needed to promote the development of the vast natural resources of the Tennessee Valley. In that region near Muscle Shoals are vast phosphate beds, red and brown iron ore, limestone, zinc, marble, pottery clay, bituminous coal, bayrite, and cement. There are great forests of fine hardwoods of all kinds, and so on. There is both water and rail transportation. In short, the makings of an industrial empire.

As pointed out by engineers in House Document No. 328, there is a great market for hydropower in adjacent States—level country with no power sites. The cities are awakening to the advantages of cheap power.

Last, but not least, beyond question when the Norris bill is law and the issues settled, the Power Trust will at once make a drive on the Government agency to capture for itself all the power it can get. This is what happened at Boulder Dam. It will happen at Muscle Shoals.

Here, then, is a common-sense view, based on known facts, of the possible market for Uncle Sam's power. The question is, Shall the Power Trust be given dominion over this future industrial empire, also the opportunity to corrupt the politics of the South as the railroads have done for the last 50 years—as indeed the Power Trust is even now doing?

THE COLONEL'S TRANSMISSION SYSTEM—AND A CHALLENGE NOT YET ACCEPTED

When President Hoover vetoed the Muscle Shoals bill last March he proclaimed that $40,000,000 would be needed to build a public transmission system—by implication—immediately. Progressives responded that this figure was ridiculous and prejudicial. Colonel Tyler's report has outdone the President. By 1935 he has expended $43,344,000 on his proposed transmission lines system. Analysis, however, must be suspended until Colonel Tyler or Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Army Engineers, or both, supply the House Military Affairs Committee or the public with the data and "working sheets" on which these estimates were based in order that they may be checked by independent engineers.

Invited by Acting Chairman McSWAIN to testify before the House Military Affairs Committee, the writer started to discuss the unsatisfactory character of Colonel Tyler's report, when Congressmen STAFFORD, of Wisconsin, Goss, of Connecticut, and other conservatives objected on the grounds that Tyler was not there.

At a later meeting—on January 23—with the colonel and Mr. W. M. McFarland, member of the President's commission, present, I stated in effect that every accountant and engineer with whom I had consulted had thrown up his hands and declared no man could check on the colonel's conclusions because of his peculiar methods and the absence of basic data. I said that wrangling was useless and a waste of the committee's time; that it should demand the underlying data, and I challenged Colonel Tyler and General Brown to produce it. That challenge has not yet been met. I am informed that Colonel Tyler has been transferred from Washington to New Orleans, and that he left three days after the hearing. If these working sheets are not forthcoming, further analysis will be in order.

The peculiar methods employed may be illustrated thus: The colonel spends millions on millions of dollars for transmission lines, but nowhere does he state how many miles he is building or give necessary specifications. At one place, however, he seems to have slipped, and we discover that his farm lines are to cost $1,625 per mile. Farmers on the Minidoka project in Idaho built their lines for $400 per mile. Tacoma farmers for $600. Power companies in Washington and Wisconsin, $600 to $700. Even the Alabama Power Co. build their farm lines for around $1,000. Hence the colonel is high, but we do not know what he proposes to do. Would he perhaps furnish gold-plated transformers?

When Seattle started its public plant it did not at once duplicate the private company's lines. It had only 36 miles of transmission lines in 1905. To-day it has 190 miles. Then it had 370 miles of distribution lines. To-day it has 3,427 miles.

Ontario Hydro started in October, 1910. After two years, in October, 1912, it had 236 miles of 110,000-volt transmission lines, serving 32 cities and towns, with an investment in lines, transformers, etc., of $4,153,000. But Colonel Tyler at the end of two years has, on paper, spent $32,258,000, or nearly eight times as much. President Hoover, who is expected to quote Tyler's figures in the coming campaign, should remember that his experiences as a promoter are of no value to him for guidance in this enterprise. Muscle Shoals transmission lines will be built as the market develops and not in white hot-house hurry to establish a grossly inflated capital account on which huge interest must be paid in order to produce a fictitious paper deficit for Uncle Sam.

The time will doubtless come when popular demand for cheap Muscle Shoals current over the South will justify $40,000,000 in transmission lines, to be paid for out of earnings and not taxes, but it will not be in four or five years. An engineer proposing such an immediate expenditure would be forthwith fired by any intelligent management of Muscle Shoals.

THE COLONEL FIXES HIS POWER RATE—AND AGREES WITH THE VETO MESSAGE

At page 64 Colonel Tyler fixes a price at which he thinks the Government might sell current. He says:

"For the purpose of this study it is assumed that the Government's wholesale rate will be 20 per cent less than the published wholesale rate in the respective States."

He does not state what these rates are or what his proposed rate is. By roundabout deduction, we are left to guess it would be from 8.5 mills to 1.6 cents. Here again he supports the veto message, which has 9.1 mills per kilowatt-hour. This figure was demolished by Senator BLACK, of Alabama, on the floor when he pointed out that Brig. Gen. Herbert Deakyne, Assistant Chief of Engineers, in the introduction to House Document 328 pointed out that when fully developed and sold Muscle Shoals power could be produced at the switchboard for 1.36 mills per kilowatt-hour and sold within a radius of 350 miles at 4.16 mills.

THE COLONEL IS APPALLED BY LEGAL BARRICADES

Passing over this incomplete mass of figures for the time being, let us examine one more of the colonel's reasons why Uncle Sam is full certain to fail at Muscle Shoals, namely, legal obstacles. "It appears," he says, "that municipalities and counties in the territory under consideration are already quite heavily in debt." Furthermore, they are inhibited by legal restrictions. He startles us with the information, for example, that:

"In Tennessee, except with a few unimportant exceptions, municipalities can not issue bonds without special authorization of the State legislature, and in no case can a municipality bond itself in excess of 10 per cent of its total assessment."

Hold, Colonel! As a lawyer you are a good electrical engineer, but you got short circuited at the wrong point, and did not read the proviso in the statute to which you refer, to be found in Shannon's Code of Tennessee Law, 1932 edition, section 3705; also carried in Shannon's Code of 1926, section 2023a–81:

"No cities or towns shall have the right to issue bonds as provided herein in such an aggregate amount as will create or increase the total bonded indebtedness thereof more than 10 per cent of the assessed valuation for the preceding year of the taxable property in said city: Provided, however, That any bonds or securities redeemable and payable out of funds derived from special assessment for public improvements or any bonds or other obligations issued for supplying such municipality with water, artificial light, heat, or power where the works for supplying the same shall be owned and controlled by such municipality shall not be included in the debt of such municipal corporation within the limitation of this section." (Italics mine.)

It is curious also that in his legal researches the colonel did not discover and proclaim the following from the constitution of Alabama:

"No law making any irrevocable or exclusive grants of special privilege or immunities shall be passed by the legislature; and every grant of a franchise, privilege, or immunity shall forever remain subject to revocation, alteration, or amendment." (Art. I, sec. 22.)

That is important. It means that the municipalities of Alabama are free to go into competition with the private companies exactly as Seattle and many other cities have done. Further, the colonel did not discover, or at least announce, that section 2465 of the Mississippi Code permits municipalities in that State to finance public-utility plants by pledging the property and income thereon as security for bonds, hence are not blocked by debt limitations in this respect. Also important.

Next comes the question, In how many of the 14 States in transmission distance of Muscle Shoals are municipalities free to compete or to finance their own utilities outside debt limitations?

The answer is too much for a layman. So I consulted one of the ablest and best informed utility attorneys in the country. His memorandum, printed as an appendix to this bulletin, may be summarized thus:

In 12 of the 14 States municipalities may compete even though private companies have so-called exclusive franchises, provided they are not contracts, and usually they are not. The exceptions are Indiana and Missouri.

In five States municipalities may finance their utilities outside debt limitations by issuing securities against the plants. They are Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Kentucky.

Furthermore, in seven other States municipal securities to finance utilities like electric plants are specifically exempted by law, in whole or in part, from ordinary debt limitations. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, and Tennessee, leaving only two States, Georgia and Louisiana, in which debt limitations might block financing municipal systems.

TAXLESS TOWNS

After all, it is a strategic blunder for the colonel to remind southern municipalities of their debts in this connection. Most American cities are in the same boat, because in the past they have given away revenue-producing franchises for electric service and the like to utility companies for private exploitation and loaded onto the taxpayer the nonrevenue functions, like sewage disposal, street building, and lighting, etc. Modern conditions have forced on cities many new functions—protection of public health, safety, recreation, education, etc., which private enterprise will not assume, hence increasing taxes and a financial impasse.

Cities are now waking up to this folly and are beginning to take over these profitable functions. National attention is turning to "taxless towns" and hundreds of other cities which pay the whole or part of their running expenses out of the profits from their own power, gas, and water plants.

I do not believe this to be an economically sound policy since it permits owners of idle land and people not using the service to profit at the expense of the utility patrons. The Ontario system of service at cost is the best, as it stimulates industry and is just to all. Yet it is better for these cities to retain these huge profits than to have them go to absentee franchise owners. For example, take the little town of Athens, Ala., 3,300 population, 40 miles from Wilson Dam. State Senator R. H. Walker, of that town, reports that the electric plant "has been a godsend to the town." Last year the net profit was $20,000. The town boasts of its White Way and well-lighted streets. It pays the Alabama Power Co. 1.3 cents per kilowatt-hour for its energy wholesale. Its profits would be increased materially if it could buy that current from the Government at 5 or 6 mills. This bulletin could be filled with short paragraphs giving like illustrations from the Southland.

Per contra, take Florence, Ala. This small city has been paying $10,000 annually for street lighting to the Alabama Power Co. for current costing $385—from Wilson Dam, in plain sight of the town, purchased at 2 mills per kilowatt-hour. The writer heard W. F. McFarland state these facts to Secretary of War Davis in 1927. He was then finance director of Florence. To-day he is a member of the Muscle Shoals Commission. He was at the hearing before the House Military Affairs Committee, before mentioned, and when queried by the writer before the committee he admitted the above statement of fact to be true.

This awakening, then, of municipal officials desperately trying to pay expenses and keep down taxes to the possibilities of municipal incomes from public assumption of franchise functions constitutes a far more serious menace to the Power Trust than agitation of public ownership theorists. It explains in part why the utility interests are spending millions in frantic opposition to what they proclaim is a dying cause. Economic necessity, therefore, will drive hundreds of municipalities, large and small, within the 350-mile radius around Muscle Shoals to seize the chance of buying wholesale power from the Government at one-half the price they now pay to the private companies. The companies must meet that price or lose the business in due course, and in any event the people will be benefited.

THE COLONEL'S CONCLUSIONS

The colonel—No. 1: "The Government's power plants at Muscle Shoals and the proposed Cove Creek development are not suitably located to serve as the main generating stations of an extensive independent power system."

On the contrary, Army engineers in House Doc. 328 (p. 521) point out there is a great shortage of hydro power in southern Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in eastern Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and in Mississippi and Kentucky. "Therefore the Tennessee River Basin is the main reliance for hydro power for this territory." These engineers estimated the power resources of the Tennessee Basin at 6,605,000 horsepower, enough to supply all possible needs of the basin for years to come and help supply other States. Muscle Shoals is much better located than Boulder Dam. To the engineers of the colonel's persuasion no public plant would be suitably located—except upon the star Canopus.

The colonel—No. 2: "The construction of any independent system would involve large expenditures of public funds."

Right. Also invested in a profitable enterprise, utilizing public property for the public welfare. Also operated and paid for out of the low rates charged, hence no burden to the taxpayers, but rather a relief to taxpayers, as shown throughout this bulletin.

The colonel—No. 3: "The cost of transmitting power in such a system would be high and the reliability of service at long distances from the generating center would be poor."

Transmission costs would be "high" indeed if Government officials and engineers were foolish enough needlessly to expand the transmission system and inflate its costs as appears to have been done in the colonel's set-up, but which we can not check up because of his omission of underlying data. An appraisal based on his map and such data as are given would indicate that his construction costs are so inflated above normal prices as to require an excessive interest of around $1,000,000 for the last 10 years of his period on transformer stations and transmission lines alone. If he or General Brown deny this, let them produce their working sheets.

The colonel—No. 4: "The construction of such an independent system would be an economic waste, in that it would duplicate transmission facilities now ample to serve the region."

Regulation has failed and will fail. Public competition has demonstrated itself as the best practical method of controlling private power rates. What does Colonel Tyler, Judge Hobbs, and Farmer O'Neal consider the millions of unjustifiable profits now taken from the pockets of the people and industries of the Muscle Shoals region by the Power Trust? Is that "economic waste"?

The colonel—No. 5: "It may be expected that the deficit from the construction and operation of such a system, which will have to be met by the Federal Treasury and by the general taxpayers, will largely exceed any savings from lower rates which may accrue to the limited local public served."

The expected deficits are of the colonel's own creation, likewise the limited area. He is challenged to submit his working sheets for examination. His fellow engineers have demonstrated that a suitable transmission system can be built and Muscle Shoals operated with no cost to the taxpayers, even out of the astounding low rates they set up.

If the Power Trust executives believe the colonel's conclusions and consequently have no fear of the competitive effect of public operation upon their extortionate profits, why have they spent millions in the last 10 years fighting the Norris bill?

CONCLUSIONS

1. The promotion of this Muscle Shoals Commission by President Hoover is an imposition upon public patience and an "economic waste," since it was intended to duplicate work already—and much better—done.

2. Its chairman and a majority of its members are not engineering experts but politicians and lobbyists beholden to the Power Trust directly or indirectly through appointment by Power Trust governors. Their conclusions were foreordained.

3. Its recommendations as to fertilizer contain the same "jokers" which have caused Congress to reject as fraudulent the bid of every private corporation seeking to grab Muscle Shoals power on the pretense of helping farmers.

4. The findings of Colonel Tyler that Government operation would create a deficit of $23,000,000 in 15 years is based upon arbitrary, undocumented assertions of his own which are proven absurd by previous nonpolitical reports of his fellow engineers.

5. President Hoover's manifest purpose in creating the commission was, by involving Democratic governors, to embarrass the Democratic Party and prevent it making Muscle Shoals an issue in the campaign. It would also embarrass progressive Republicans. The report is a campaign document intended to catch farm votes without sacrificing Mr. Hoover's main political support, the Power Trust.

Memorandum: Re restrictions upon municipality owned and operated utilities in States within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals

I. RIGHT TO COMPETE

Under the prevailing state of law as interpreted by decisions of State and Federal courts a municipality in any of the following States may establish an electric plant to operate with in its respective municipal limits in competition with privately owned utilities, notwithstanding the fact that it has issued to the utility a franchise, in accordance with the following table:

State	Where private company's franchise is not exclusive	Where private company's franchise purports to be exclusive but is not in the form of a contract with the city	Where private company's franchise purports to be exclusive but is in the form of a contract with the city
Alabama	Yes	Yes	Yes.
Arkansas	Yes	Yes	Yes.
Florida	Yes	Yes	No.
Georgia	Yes	Yes	No.
Illinois	Yes	Yes	Yes.
Indiana [1]	No	No	No.
Kentucky	Yes	Yes	No.
Louisiana	Yes	Yes	Yes.[2]
Mississippi	Yes	Yes	Yes.
Missouri [1]	No	No	No.
North Carolina	Yes	Yes	Yes.[2]
South Carolina	Yes	Yes	No.
Tennessee	Yes	Yes	Yes.[2]

[1] Municipal plant operations subject to complete supervision of the State public service commission.
[2] Probably.

In Alabama competitive municipal operations appear to be authorized by law. The commission approval necessary for the exercise of all franchises, as required by sections 9763 and 9764 of the State laws, is not applicable to municipally owned utilities (see secs. 9631, 9712, 9741). Nor is there any other provision of State law which appears to impose any limitation upon the right of a municipality to engage in the operation of an electrical utility regardless of existing competitive franchises.

The same conclusion is obtained from a study of Arkansas law in view of the fact that the constitution of that State (art. 2, sec. 19) forbids the granting or performance of exclusive franchises which would amount to "perpetuities or monopolies."

In Florida and Georgia the State commissions have no authority over municipal plants, and municipalities are not under any statutory or constitutional limitation with respect to engaging in public-utility operations themselves, regardless of the existence of a franchise, except where such franchises amount to a contract between the municipality and the particular public utility which would bind the municipality not to engage in such public-utility operations. As a matter of practice, the usual franchises granted in Florida and Georgia contain no such contractual limitations upon the municipalities of those States.

In Illinois the statutes expressly make it lawful for any municipality to incorporate in any franchise to any utility a reservation of the right of the municipality to take over all or any part of the equipment used in the operations of such utility at or before the expiration of such franchise (Laws, 1913, p. 455, sec. 6 (6)). As a matter of practice, municipalities of Illinois have automatically inserted such a reservation in all of the franchises granted since that date.

In Indiana a municipal electric plant is a "public utility" within the meaning of the Indiana Public Service Commission act (sec. 1), and no municipality may construct, operate, or acquire any utility plant where there is already in operation a public utility engaged in a similar service without first securing the permission and approval of the commission (sec. 97, Public Service Commission act). As an indication of the policy followed by the Indiana commission in administering this law see Re City of Huntington (P. U. R. 1932A, 61), in which it refused to authorize a city to operate an electric plant in competition with a private electric utility in the absence of convincing evidence that public convenience and necessity required such additional service.

In Kentucky there is no constitutional or statutory limitation upon the right of a municipality to grant an exclusive franchise, and where such franchise has been granted in the form of a contract between the municipality and the privately owned electric utility the municipality would probably be restrained from breaching such a contract by entering into competitive service before the termination of the contract. Therefore it would be a question of fact in each particular instance whether the existing franchise between the privately owned utility and the municipality was first in the form of a contract and second an exclusive contract. In the absence of either of these two factors municipal operation would be lawful.

In Louisiana, sections 4 and 7 of article 6 of the State constitution specifically exempt from the jurisdiction of the State commission the right of municipalities to engage in the operation of electric plants. (See State v. City of New Orleans, P. U. R. 1922E, 183.) And since a municipality can not lawfully contract away its statutory or constitutional right to operate an electric plant (see Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Texas Power & Light Co., P. U. R. 1929E, 483) (decision of the United States circuit court), it is probable that competitive operations by a municipality would be permissible in any event.

In Missouri the operation of a municipal electric utility is subject to the approval of the commission. (Sec. 10478, General Laws.) The policy of the Missouri commission, like that of the Indiana commission mentioned above, appears to be consistently opposed to the authorization of new competitive electric service in a territory where the existing service is not shown to be inadequate. (See Re Midwest Transit Co., P. U. R. 1928C, 311.)

In North Carolina, by the enactment of chapter 285, section 1, Public Laws of 1929, municipalities are specifically authorized to engage in the operation of electric utilities within or without the corporate limits. (See Holmes v. City of Fayetteville, P. U. R. 1930A, 369.) Insomuch as in North Carolina municipalities are not subject to commission jurisdiction, it would naturally follow, according to the rule laid down by the United States circuit court in the Fairbanks Morse & Co. v. Texas Power & Light Co. case, that the North Carolina municipalities could not, by franchise or otherwise, contract away their statutory right to engage in utility operations.

In Ohio, in the absence of an exclusive franchise, a municipality may engage in the rendition of public-utility service notwithstanding the existence of adequate privately conducted service. (Hamilton Gas Light & Coke Co. v. Hamilton, 37 Fed. 832.) The Ohio commission has no jurisdiction over municipal plants. (See Georgetown Water Co., 26 Ohio District Reports 77.)

In South Carolina the franchise is looked upon as a contractual obligation binding both the city and the utility. (See State v. Broad River Power Co., P. U. R. 1930A, 65.) Therefore, inasmuch as there is nothing in the South Carolina statutes or constitution forbidding exclusive franchises, and inasmuch as municipal utilities are not subject to commission jurisdiction in South Carolina, it would remain a question of fact in each particular case whether or not the muncipality had contracted by franchise not to enter into competitive service.

In Tennessee municipal utilities are not subject to commission jurisdiction. The policy of the State, however, evidently favors competition rather than monopoly. (See Franklin Power & Light Co., P. U. R. 1930A, 40.)

II. RIGHT TO ISSUE SECURITIES AGAINST PLANT

In the following States the acquisition of electrical utilities by municipalities may be financed by the issuance of municipal securities chargeable only against the utility property involved and revenues accruing from the operation thereof, and hence not constituting an indebtedness of the respective municipality within the meaning of the provisions of the State constitution or State statutes concerning municipal-debt limitations:

State and citation of law

Ohio: Constitution, article 8, section 12.

Indiana: Special Laws of 1927, chapter 190, section 2. (See also Statutes 1926, secs. 1109–1114. See also decision of State supreme court, 141 N. E. 222.)

Illinois: Statutes 1929, chapter 24, section 456.

Missouri: Revised Statutes of 1919, section 1484, chapter 72, article 3. (Also sec. 7976 (7); also sec. 1905. See also Laws 1921, p. 166. See also State constitution, art. 10, sec. 12, as amended in 1920.)

Kentucky: Laws of 1922, sections 3024a–8, 3024a–9.

In the following States municipal securities issued for the acquisition of electrical-utility plants are exempted in whole or in part from normal application of debt limitations:

Alabama: Constitution, article 12, section 225.

Arkansas: Constitution, article 16, section 1.

Florida: Compiled Laws, 1927, section 3061.

Mississippi: Special Laws of 1920, chapter 169.

North Carolina: Supplement, 1924, section 2943 (2).

South Carolina: Constitution, article 8, section 7.

Tennessee: Shannon's Code, 1926, section 2023–a–81.

In the following States municipal securities for the acquisition of electrical plants are apparently subject to the normal application of debt limitations insomuch as no specific statute or constitutional provisions exempt such securities:

Georgia and Louisiana.

Supplementing the table containing the second group of States, I find that in Alabama municipalities may increase the usual limit of indebtedness from 5 to 8 per cent of the total value of assessed property where the purpose of the transaction is to finance a municipal utility plant.

Likewise Florida cities may extend their indebtedness by 7 per cent for the same purpose. In Mississippi the limit can be increased from 10 to 15 per cent.

In North Carolina and South Carolina and Tenneessee the debt limitation does not apply to municipal-utility ventures. So also in Arkansas. (See Park v. Huddleston, 172 Ark. 999.)

THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present a short communication from Hon. Edna G. Fuller, of Orlando, Fla., inclosing some resolutions which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORLANDO, FLA., February 3, 1932.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Inclosed please find a resolution which was adopted by the Missionary Assembly at Orlando, Fla.

Will you kindly present this resolution to the Senate of the United States and ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Very cordially yours,

EDNA G. FULLER
(Hon. Edna G. Fuller),
Chairman for Orlando, Fla.,
Chain of Missionary Assemblies.

Whereas there was a widely published announcement by the opponents of the eighteenth amendment that a test vote would be taken by the Congress of the United States on a referendum to the States for the modification of this amendment; and

Whereas the vote upon this measure revealed an overwhelming majority against such referendum: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Missionary Assembly, now in session in Orlando, Fla., send to the Senate of the United States, through our Senators, DUNCAN U. FLETCHER and PARK TRAMMELL, an expression of our approval and appreciation of its clear and loyal sustaining of the United States Constitution.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 1567) establishing a revolving fund to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture for agricultural-credit purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 189) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1856) to provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation, and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 190) thereon.

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 3282. An act to extend the time for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco from the Rincon Hill district in San Francisco, by way of Goat Island, to Oakland (Rept. No. 191);

H. R. 81. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Catawissa Railroad Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Catawissa, Pa. (Rept. No. 192); and

H. R. 7247. An act authorizing the Rhode Island State Board of Public Roads and the State Highway Department of the State of Connecticut to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Pawcatuck River near the location of the present Broad Street Bridge between Westerly, R. I., and Stonington, Conn. (Rept. No. 193).

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish equipment, goods, and supplies to governors and acting governors for use in aid of distressed citizens, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 194) thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to which were referred the following bill and joint resolution, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 417. An act to provide a government for American Samoa (Rept. No. 195); and

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution to change the name of the island of "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico" (Rept. No. 196).

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 5th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 355. An act providing for the participation of the United States in A Century of Progress (the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration), to be held at Chicago, Ill., in 1933, authorizing an appropriation therefor, and for other purposes; and

S. 2334. An act to amend section 3 of the rivers and harbors act approved June 13, 1902, as amended and supplemented.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. NORBECK, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, reported favorably the nomination of Guy Francis Barnes, of South Dakota, to be register of the land office at Pierre, S. Dak. (reappointment), which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of George A. Mauk, of Arizona, to be United States marshal, district of Arizona, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 3543) for the relief of Robert Emil Taylor; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 3544) for the relief of M. Thomas Petroy; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3545) for the relief of Patrick J. Lynch; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 3546) to amend the act of February 25, 1927, entitled "An act to confer United States citizenship upon certain inhabitants of the Virgin Islands and to extend the naturalization laws thereto" (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

A bill (S. 3547) to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire, exchange, transfer, and sell certain tracts of real estate, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 3548) for the relief of Edward J. Boyle; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DILL:

A bill (S. 3549) for the relief of John M. Elliott; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3550) granting an increase of pension to Betty J. Sale; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HASTINGS:

A bill (S. 3551) granting a pension to Belle A. Middlebrook (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 3552) granting a pension to Ruth H. Cameron; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 3553) for the relief of Charles J. Cook (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3554) for the relief of Henry A. Richmond; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3555) for the relief of Alexander Gilchrist, jr.; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. STEIWER:

A bill (S. 3556) granting a pension to Matilda Jane Hart (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana:

A bill (S. 3557) granting a pension to Alonzo Borden (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3558) granting a pension to Maggie Crist (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 3559) granting a pension to Denver W. M. White; and

A bill (S. 3560) granting an increase of pension to Frank G. Beck; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PATTERSON:

A bill (S. 3561) granting an increase of pension to Minerva E. Shoemaker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3562) for the relief of former Lieut. Col. Timothy J. Powers; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3563) to provide riprap for the Galveston, Tex., jetty lighthouse;

A bill (S. 3564) to provide range lights at the entrance to Brazos-Santiago Harbor, Tex.;

A bill (S. 3565) to provide minor lights to meet the needs of night navigation on the dredged channel from Aransas Pass to Corpus Christi, Tex.; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 3566) for the relief of Donald O. Miller; and

A bill (S. 3567) authorizing the President to reappoint Edward C. Englehardt a first lieutenant of Field Artillery, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3568) granting a pension to Blewett M. Goode; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 3569) to amend the act of May 27, 1930, authorizing an appropriation for the reconstruction and improvement of a road on the Shoshone Indian Reservation, Wyo.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

AMENDMENTS TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7912, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 72, line 14, after the word "grain," insert the word "cottonseed."

On page 74, line 19, add the following: "Provided, That the establishment of mandatory standard grades for cottonseed and supervision thereof be included in the service now performed under the grain standard act."

COMMITTEE SERVICE

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] be assigned to service on the following committees: Naval Affairs, Manufactures, and Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] may be relieved from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be entered.

WORLD COURT'S AUSTRO-GERMAN DECISION

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I present comments on the Austro-German decision of the World Court, which I would like to have inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

1. Generally speaking, the French press received the news of the actual decision without any particular concern. France already had scored her triumph in forcing Germany and Austria to renounce the customs union before the League of Nations without waiting for the decision by the World Court.

2. Nevertheless, the general tendency of the French press was to accuse the judges of following political impulses and engaging in bargaining negotiations instead of considering the dispute purely on juridical grounds. In French eyes, however, these regrettable manifestations were seen as having taken place among those who opposed the French thesis. In the Echo de Paris the nationalist writer, Pertinax, was particularly pointed in his remarks on the political elements entering into the court's decision. Le Temps, which in these matters usually reflects official opinion, said:

"The attitude of certain judges from friendly and allied countries which are as interested as France in upholding the spirit and letter of the peace treaties is somewhat disconcerting. In some quarters this attitude is interpreted as an effort to avoid as much as possible humiliation for Berlin and Vienna. This, we believe, is inadmissible: If judges of the World Court yield to political considerations, the court, whose sole duty is to interpret the law impartially, will become a singularly dangerous element in the struggle for international peace and concord."

The weekly journal, Cyrano, says:

"For him who wished to calculate the results of 10 years of a policy of political surrender (an attack on the Briand policy), a simple calling of the roll will suffice.

"Voting against the French thesis were the American, the Englishman, the Japanese, and the Belgian.

"The jurists of The Hague reflected more or less the opinions of their governments.

"So, doubtless, America would recompense us for our renunciation of reparations in favor of the speculators of Wall Street.

"So the Labor Party would repay us for our intervention in favor of the Bank of England."

3. As was to have been expected from such an anticlimax to the French triumph recorded at Geneva, the finding of the court was regarded here as "distinctly unsatisfactory." Especial fears were voiced that it might encourage the Germans and the Austrians to try again at the first opportunity.

4. The French observed that the activities of the Cuban judge, Bustamante, were largely instrumental in bringing it about that a decision in favor of France was reached at all. In this connection it may be recalled that both Bustamante and Guerrero, of Salvador, are regarded as friends of France (the French group at Geneva elected Guerrero president of the assembly of the league in 1929) and are wearers of the Legion of Honor.

5. In many quarters the minority opinion was branded as the result of an Anglo-Saxon leadership in which Chinese and Japanese joined. The Belgian's vote was assailed as "base desertion" of the French cause, an attack which was generally broadcast in Belgium itself particularly by the Francophile press.

6. With signally few exceptions, very little attention was given by the French press to the juridical aspects of the decision, for, to France, the Austro-German project has always been and is certain to remain primarily a political problem.

SWISS OPINIONS ABOUT THE HAGUE VERDICT CONCERNING THE AUSTRO-GERMAN CUSTOMS UNION

The semiofficial Bund, of Berne in his leader World Justice a verdict, even after Austria's voluntary renunciation of the German customs union. What is the practical use of the ultimate sanction given by The Hague court by a weak majority of one voice in favor of the French opinions? The authority of the world justice has not gained anything. The Hague court ought to reserve its activity and verdicts for real contests between two countries about the interpretation of international law. What is the use of investing an arropage of judges with the highest international honors if it is to be exposed at the occasion of a trifling matter to run the risk of giving a political rather than a juridical verdict, like the sentence of September 5, 1931, in which The Hague court declares the Austro-German customs union incompatible with the treaty of St. Germain. All the rejecting judges of the World Court hail from Latin countries—Italy, Spain, San Salvador, Colombia, Cuba, Rumania, France, and its satellite, Poland, while the seven judges in favor of the Austro-German customs union belong to Teutonic races—Hurst, England; Schueking, Germany; van Eysinga, Holland; and even Rolin Jacquemyns, Belgium, abandoning his French ally; Kellogg, United States of America, united to the far eastern Japanese, Adacti, and Wang, China. This racial grouping in a world verdict gave a very bad impression in Switzerland. The Bund congratulates itself that Switzerland has no representative for the present in the World Court.

How far we are from Wilson's claim for open-door politics! The Hague verdict had been cast forehand behind closed doors long before it was officially made public. "Une Paix de Justice" was the slogan under which the allied nations fought the World War to its bitter end. Can not the World Court, established by the world peace, in future be protected from such blunders as this customs union verdict. May Switzerland raise its voice in Geneva in favor of true world justice.

The Nationalzeitung Basel thinks that this whole custom-union business was put on the stage by the German and Austrian politicians rather as a test for political strength than out of economical necessities of either or both countries. France gave the right answer, after which the Austro-German allies staged up a verdict of the World Court in order to discredit this high institution, at least in the opinion of their own countrymen, in which they have been successful, knowing in advance like anybody else how this verdict would turn out. For that reason the court ought to have refrained from giving a verdict at all, in the interests of world justice.

The Zuricher Zeitung, Journal de Geneve, and Gazette de Lausanne express no special opinion of their own, they bring ample information about German, Austrian, and French opinions.

The Provincial Press, in various little cantons, expresses Swiss opinion more freely than the city press which has a large number of readers in Germany as well as in France, and therefore is bound to stick to neutrality as much as possible. As a rule the German Swiss press expresses its fear that the political judgment of The Hague court augurs badly for the future verdict which the World Court will have to give in the Geneva-zone contest, between Switzerland and France. The World Court's judges majority seem to stand more or less under the moral influence of France, so that no country which stands in contest against French interests can expect a fair chance in a verdict of The Hague court under its present composition.

In a certain contradiction to this opinion the papers of the embroidery and cotton industry of eastern Switzerland are much satisfied with the burial of the Austro-German custom-union bogey. It can not be indifferent to Switzerland if the two large frontiers of the north and of the east are merged into one single. Our Swiss political and economic independence is the easier to be defended the more neighbors we have. Austria is yet a country favorable for Swiss exports. After a custom union it would be assimilated to Germany, and Switzerland would be knocked out of competition in Austria by Germany. The political union would certainly ensue out of the custom union sooner or later; in case of war German troops would stand behind the Swiss boundary from Basel as far as the Italian Stelvio, whereas now the German boundary reaches only up to Lake Constance, which is quite far enough.

In the Swiss Italian press much attention was given to the opinion expressed by the Italian representative of The Hague court, Anzilotti. The custom union between Germany and Austria, according to Anzilotti, is only objectionable because it might have been the first step of the political union between Germany and Austria, the famous Anchluss to which none of the successors of the old Hapsburg Empire will ever agree, because it might put in question all the existing treaties of southeastern Europe. Austria would be welcome to conclude custom unions with any one of and preferably with all its neighbors which are now holding ancient parts of the Austrian Empire. Austria is a most welcome good neighbor to Switzerland as long as it remains a neutral small republic, a united German-Austro Reich would be a menace to Switzerland in case of war and economically in time of peace.

BERLIN

Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung (Berlin) prominent organ of industry:

"Not only The Hague court but the League of Nations as well has been dealt a heavy blow by the verdict of the court. Confidence in these two institutions—as far as any still exists—has been severely shaken because the verdict clearly proves that only what France dictates Geneva does and that nothing is allowed to happen which might hamper France.

"No one characterized the verdict better than the foremost members of the court who made up the minority: Adachi, Kellogg, Baron Rolain, Sir Cecil Hurst, van Eysings, and Wand. These men, who, without a doubt, represent the spiritual leaders of the court, find proof lacking in the verdict of the majority as to how and why the customs union should threaten or endanger the independence of Austria. It is a case without precedent when they consider it necessary to expressedly state that the 'court must not have anything to do with political considerations or political consequences as these lie beyond the court's competence.' These law experts apparently could not remove entirely the impression that their colleagues of the majority who reached their decision under pressure of the Cuban, Bustamente, could not always keep themselves free from such considerations.

"The objectiveness and spiritual independence of the members of the highest court are beyond all doubt sublime. As Germans we have no interest in lowering their esteem which, in a number of cases—of secondary importance—has even worked out in our favor. That the French Government's news agency already knew the verdict, which was proclaimed on a Sunday, on the preceding Monday is, from a medicinal standpoint, a highly remarkable case of absolute clairvoyance. And it is entirely out of question that any one of the judges should have felt the slightest division of feelings between the rôle of the objective seeker of the truth on the one hand and that of considering the interests of his country on the other; i. e., the double rôle of judge and accuser in one."

Germania (Berlin), Catholic Centrist newspaper, official organ of Chancellor Bruening's party:

"Now that it has become quite clear that French policy had applied all available means of pressure to crush the Austro-German Customs Union, one may be tempted to ask whether the decision at The Hague has really been made purely on the principles of international law. Such important voices as those of America, England, Holland, and even Belgium supported the customs union, whereas as many as three representatives of nations who are parties in the quarrel were among those against it. If we look at The Hague decision we can only say that all human work is imperfect. Juridically, the Franco-Czechoslovakian thesis has won; politically, French superiority of power has crushed the Austro-German initiative.

"The reproach of insufficient study of the problem, which The Hague minority makes to the majority, as well as its statement that the court must deal neither with political considerations nor with political consequences, allows the conclusion that even among the judges political influences were not deemed out of question.

"If one sees the representatives of France, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Italy, and the representative of Colombia, Urrutia, who is already well known by his activities in the League of Nations, unanimously among the champions of the incompatibility thesis, the question is perhaps not unjustified, whether really only an unprejudiced interpretation of the texts in question or the spirit of 1919 has prompted this decision."

Kreuz Zeitung, Berlin (official Monarchist organ):

"We now know that eight judges voted against the customs union, whereas seven were of the opinion that the union contradicted none of the existing agreements. The minority proved by excellent and incontestable arguments, free from all political considerations, that customs unions do not endanger the national independence of treaty powers. On the opposing side we find, besides the Frenchman, representatives of countries who are vassals of France, as well as South American apprentices of French culture.

"The verdict will not serve to better the reputation of The Hague court. It proves that the ability to pass a purely juridical verdict is only possible at the very best in questions lying beside the road of big politics.

"Absolutely below the dignity of the court was the violation of the official secret, which the French judge was obviously to blame for. The ceremony of sealing and opening this document, the main contents of which were already known to all in advance, was thereby practically reduced to a farce."

SUPPLEMENTAL BERLIN

The Berlin Deutsche Zeitung, organ of the agrarians of the right wing, featured in headlines across its entire front page an address by Counselor of Justice Doctor Wildhagen, president of the German Barristers' Congress, at the opening of the congress in Luebeck. He said:

"The insolence of our enemies will some day find its limits, and the victory of The Hague court is a Pyrrhic victory for haughty France. One must not count the votes but weigh them. The other seven weigh heavier than the votes of the eight cast against us.

"The day will come! The history of the world continues to remain court of the world."

On which the Deutsche Zeitung commented:

"The president of the German Barristers' Congress has only made use of his right of reprimanding a court whose members were picked with the aim of political distribution of power and which passed a judgment based on political principles."

LEIPZIG

Leipziger Neueste Nachricten (outstanding financial and industrial organ of northeastern Germany):

"THE TRAGEDY OF THE CUSTOMS UNION

"September 6, 1931, will have to be remembered. On that day an illusion was buried—one which had many disciples in Germany also—the ideal of The Hague Court of Arbitration, the ideal of an independent justice superior to parties, to groups of powers, and to nations.

"Since September 6, 1931, we know that The Hague court is tainted politically. We know that the new method of appointing the judges, insisted upon by France, has degraded the court to be in part a court of hired counsellors to give their opinions, men who hold their offices because their opinions always are the opinions of their superiors. By the side of this time-serving mentality the atmosphere of free judicial personalities withers away, and one can see that The Hague court has sunk to be an instrument of the French policy of force.

"All fears expressed on the occasion of the last revision of The Hague statutes—that at French instigation, it left the appointment of the 15 judges to a majority of the League of Nations—have been realized. The Hague court is a juridically camouflaged agency of Geneva which has not even avoided the scandal of representatives of South American negro and half-caste States deciding what Germany, what Austria may do and what not; San Salvador, Cuba, and Colombia.

"In this respect nothing has been altered since the war. France mobilizes against Germany and Austria the continents with their colored people. 'Justice belongs also to the spoils of war'—but that it should be just The Hague court which proves this sentence to be true, Oswald Spengler hardly anticipated when he wrote it in a bitter hour.

"The depressing impression that at The Hague justice was a playball is increased by weighing the value of the voices which have passed upon the life interests of Germany and Austria. At the side of France and Italy, who have a natural interest in disturbing German-Austrian relations, we see the ring of French satellites, Poland and Rumania, which showed in this manner its gratitude for the preferential agreement; Spain, which since the beginning of the League of Nations has always been on the side of France, and, further, those South American exotic States—Salvador, Colombia, and Cuba—whose political and actual weight, whose part in the molding of modern culture and society is considerably more illusionary than the part of Poland and Rumania.

"Against this collection of part and whole trivialities, led by France, Italy, and Spain, stood the large States of old civilization, old influence, and highly developed juridical institutions—England, Holland, Belgium, the United States, Germany, China, and Japan—who decided for the rightful admissibility of the customs union and who have branded openly the procedure of the French exotic group as a political disregard of justice.

"A more striking proof is unthinkable of the nonsense of a democracy which by mechanical equalization of votes had led to the leveling of values—in this instance to the leveling of the rank of the historically mature nationalities.

"This 'Democracy of States' which marched up to The Hague court as the electoral herd of France, this political inflation in the sphere of purely supernational justice caused by France, means the complete, hardly to be repaired, exposure of The Hague idea. It is an exposure which will have its international reactions."

MUNICH

Muenchener-Augsburger Abendzeitung (Munich), prominent agrarian organ:

"For the simplest conception of justice it is evident that The Hague decision is a purely political decree of power. Everywhere the political will is noticeable which pushes justice aside.

"Never has a verdict been substantiated with more mockery. And it is gratifying that public opinion throughout the world believes that with this verdict The Hague court has lost its moral reputation. The false decision is still more accentuated by the minority opinion of the seven judges who voted in favor of the customs union. They stress the view that the court has to deal exclusively with the juridical question and must leave alone all considerations of a political nature.

"Of fundamental importance is the minority's opinion that the independence of a State is in no way limited by the conclusion of custom unions.

"The moral effect of The Hague verdict is that the fundamental standpoint of the German and Austrian Governments has found full and unlimited support and that The Hague court has, through its politically influenced character, been deprived of every moral importance."

Voelkischer Beobachter (Munich), national Socialist newspaper and official organ of the Hitler party:

"The French knew 10 days in advance how the decision of The Hague court would turn out. From the juridical side nothing could be said against a German-Austrian customs union. It was therefore necessary to construct a political case out of a purely juridical one. The Italian judge, Anzilotti, who voted against the customs union, admitted that such a union between Austria and any other country besides Germany would be possible without violating the Geneva protocol. One needs only to think of Italy's endeavors to attain an Austro-Italian customs union as well as of Hungary's newspapers, which have repeatedly written in favor of an Austro-Hungarian customs union. Anzilotti did not act as member of The Hague court but as an Italian who wanted to establish a precedent.

"One can therefore see clearly that the international court in The Hague is not a nonnational and nonpolitical institution but that there, exactly as in Geneva, political interests play the part of the judge. The Hague verdict must, therefore, shake the confidence of all lawful States in that institution, especially the confidence of those nations who are now degraded to second-class ones."

BELGIUM

La Gazette (Brussels), September 9, 1931:

"The French press has not stressed very much the "desertion" of the Belgian representative at the Permanent Court of International Justice. A few conservative, or moderate newspapers, however, sadly pointed out that M. Rolin-Jacquemyns had rallied to the minority which favored the "Anschluss." The honorable international judge can not be personally held responsible, for he merely followed the orders of his government.

"When voting against the French-Czech-Italian thesis, under the guise of M. Rolin-Jacquemyns, Messrs. Hymans and Renkin (Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs and Belgian Prime Minister) committeed a double error. A political error, for the Austro-German tariff union comports a grave war danger, such, at least, is the opinion of staunch pacifists. Secondly, a psychological error, for the accused, Austria and Germany, are by no means satisfied by a verdict which almost proves they are right, while France, on the other hand, may justly regard the attitude of the Belgian judge as an unfriendly manifestation.

"Those involved in this matter would be wrong to pretend that The Hague Court had to give only a legal opinion. This argument would be without value if it had not still more strengthened the Austro-German thesis. For it is impossible not to know or to deny that the tariff union is a political problem. The Pan-European Commission and the Council of the League of Nations have proved that sufficiently when they resorted to The Hague Court. This evasion deceived no one. The economic aspect of the question was more important than the legal one, and far less important than the political aspect. The international judges have taken a back door out of the problem. * * * One understands now why the council thanked The Hague court, which tried to spare the feelings of both parties by pronouncing a colorless, odorless, shapeless verdict * * *."

HOLLAND

Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam), influential Dutch commercial organ, printed in Amsterdam:

"The evidence, as far as it exists, upon which the verdict of The Hague court of the Austro-German Customs Union is based shows only too clearly that in the formation of the jury of judges politics played too great a rôle."

SWITZERLAND

Neue Zuericher Zeitung (Zurich), one of the largest and most important Swiss newspapers:

"The grouping of the court, as well as various divergencies in the motives, let the court's opinion appear to be rather torn, but it irrefutably follows from it that the barely sufficient majority of the court allowed itself to a large extent to be guided by political motives."

Baseler Nachrichten (Basel), important Swiss financial organ:

"We can not wholly suppress our great surprise over the piteous meagerness with which the majority of judges of The Hague court believed themselves justified in agreeing. The decisive sentences of the verdict are stutters and mumbles but not arguments. We do not believe that even the smallest Swiss county court of the backwoods would dare to issue such a verdict."

L'Excelsior, September 6, 1931:

"The distribution of the votes is also extremely peculiar, as we have seen elsewhere. The French thesis had the votes of the Polish, Italian, French, Spanish, Colombian, Cuban, Salvador, and Rumanian judges. The German thesis was supported by the Japanese, the American, the Belgian, British, German, Dutch, and Chinese. This is all the more regrettable since, even if the judges did not as a matter of fact represent their respective countries at the court of The Hague, there can be no doubt for anybody that very often their judgments are political acts which reflect the opinion and interests of these governments.

"One thing is certain: The judgment of the court of The Hague on the Anschluss is not of a nature to encourage any governments in the future to submit their problems of vital interest to its arbitration."

HAMBURG

Hamburger Fremdenblatt (influential, widely read commercial organ):

"It is to be greatly regretted that in appointing the judges of The Hague court, political standpoints were maintained. We have no intention of accusing the judges of The Hague court of having been biased in their judgment. But on the other hand, it is only human and comprehensible that judges have more understanding for the party they are closest to than for the viewpoint of the opposing party.

"To-day's example is the best proof for the necessity of changing the statutes of the court in the interests of its reputation. It would be better if the judges belonged to the countries who are not parties in the issue at stake, no matter what it is.

"Otherwise the reputation of The Hague court, upon which rests its usefulness in international quarrels, will very soon be wrecked. The first step in this direction has unfortunately already been made."

BRESLAU

Breslauer Neueste Nachrichten (outstanding agrarian organ of eastern Germany):

"There is no doubt about it, German politics have suffered a decisive defeat at The Hague, and France has carried through her will.

"Even though the verdict was clothed in a mantel of international law and economics, it was after all nothing more than a decision of superior power by the victor, which turned out to the disadvantage of the vanquished, politically weaker party."

AUSTRIA

Reichspost (Vienna), leading Catholic organ in Vienna:

"The expert in international law is under the influence, either consciously or unconsciously, of the spiritual and political tendencies of his native country. With the best will and firmest intention to remain objective, he never will be nonpartisan when he is confronted by great and far-reaching political problems.

"Without any reproaches or insinuations we, therefore, note that with the two fronts which faced each other at The Hague political character was not missing.

"On the one side stands France with friendly Poland and the Latin powers; on the other Germany with the Anglo-Saxon powers, Holland, Japan, and China.

"It is the same grouping of powers which would have been expected had those 15 countries sent official, representative statesmen instead of judges.

"Only the viewpoint of the Belgian judge who voted with the Germans and Anglo-Saxons was a surprise. But one must not forget that the Belgian standpoint toward the issue in question had to take into consideration the existence of the Belgian-Luxemburg customs union.

"The viewpoint that The Hague court can not withhold itself from political considerations is shown by the strong minority, which clearly stated that it did not wish to touch political considerations and consequences. This in itself represents without a doubt a criticism on the preface to the verdict of the majority as well as of the negotiations themselves."

Neue Freie Presse (Vienna), prominent Austrian financial newspaper:

"It will not be possible to find anyone who doubts the objectiveness of the judges or who suspects them of base motives. But The Hague court's verdict does show how tremendously difficult it is to make one's self wholly free from one's national psychology and from those, perhaps, unconscious feelings in which the juridical element does not always predominate.

"The American Secretary of State, Kellogg, is the creator of the world peace pact which carries his name. Would he have favored a customs union if he had suspected that such a treaty has only the aim of bringing about the danger of a new war and setting fire to Europe? It is clear that within the limits of a wholly political world, in a controversy in which politics and law can hardly be held apart, in the face of pressure which closely resembled threats, under all these conditions neither side can boast of a real victory."

Neues Wiener Extrablatt (Vienna), agragrian governmental organ:

"We do not intend to argue against The Hague court verdict or against the fact that in this case not judges but representatives of individual states have voted. But we do want to make it clear that this verdict is based upon Austria's economic dependency, upon her economic plight, which should have been alleviated by the customs union.

"The lawyers of The Hague court hardly realized how their verdict has disclosed the ruthlessness and shamefulness of conditions in which the people of Europe still live to-day. Their verdict has shown to the world that the self-determination of countries, like any other merchandise, is being made the object of transactions. The League of Nations has condemned the slave traffic in Liberia, but it has permitted the codification of the traffic of nations in Europe.

"With only one majority vote, only with the help of French vassals, only with the votes of exotic nations which naturally have not the slightest understanding of European conditions and who probably do not even know on what part of the map Vienna and Berlin lie, has this verdict been brought about. Colombia, and San Salvador have voted against us and Cuba has cast the decisive vote. It is a pity that Liberia or any other negro state or community of Indians or Congo negroes was not also allowed to judge whether Germany and Austria were justified in closing a customs union.

"The power of France, the fear of Italy, national egoism, and a ruthless policy of power superiority and self-interest have voted against the customs union.

"Now as in history of the past might has crushed right."

Wiener Neueste Nachrichten-(Vienna)-Pan-German organ of Prime Minister Schober's party:

"The Hague court's verdict on the Austro-German customs union will not, it is safe to say, contribute very much toward bettering the reputation of that court. The verdict carries the stamp of politics too intimately. Besides the votes of France, Italy, Poland, and Rumania, all of whose viewpoint was too obvious from the very start, the majority hostile toward the customs union was made up only of the judges from Spain and three fifth-class South American nations—Colombia, San Salvador, and Cuba.

"In The Hague the votes are counted and not weighed, and so it came that the most noted personalities of international law, Kellogg, Adachi, Sir Cecil Hurst, and Schuecking were voted down."

BERLIN

Berliner Lokal Anzeiger (one of Germany's largest newspapers, official organ of the German National Party headed by Alfred Hugenberg):

"The criticism by the minority of the The Hague court authoritatively characterizes the court's verdict as absolutely political. As a matter of fact, the whole affair was 100 per cent political. Not only was The Hague court accessible to French influence, but Austria herself was in the same position since she was simply strangled financially by France. It is now only too evident that the serious crisis which has swept over Europe since last spring, promising us one of the worst winters of our history, has been systematically brought about by France through the withdrawal of credits, the sabotage of the Hoover plan, etc., as a counteraction against the Austro-German customs union. In this battle we have been defeated and the voluntary withdrawal of the proposed union by Austria and Germany signified nothing more than the concerted appeal of both nations for an armistice.

"The declaration by the minority sufficiently characterizes in hard, cold words the juridical wire pulling which took place in The Hague. This declaration was signed by the American, Kellogg.

"This caricature of a lawful verdict will not have any juridical consequences. But besides the already obvious, other consequences, there is also the one that America will hold herself even more aloof of the League of Nations than has hitherto been the case, now that the leading judge of the United States has distinctly described the methods employed by the highly honorable assembly in Geneva, together with the amicable willingness of cooperation of The Hauge court.

"Things speak for themselves. There is nothing more to say."

Berliner Boersen Zeitung (powerful Berlin financial organ of the Right Wing):

"It is becoming more and more evident that the decision of The Hague court has been received as a sensation throughout the political world constituted by all interested powers. The reasons for this are due, first, to the fact that a majority could be found in this world supreme court to rule against a juridically incontestable proposal, and, second, because the formation of this majority as well as the minority allow far-reaching conclusions.

"In nearly all countries it is openly outspoken that The Hague verdict came about as the result of political influences. The political ties of the majority of those who voted with France against Germany and Austria are too obvious to make uninfluenced judgment appear plausible. It is significant that for the first time in the history of The Hague court the report of the minority exercises sharp criticism on the report of the majority."

HUNGARY

Magyarsag (conservative opposition daily of Budapest):

"The verdict of The Hague tribunal did not cause any great sensation. Great surprise, however, was caused by the legal representatives, the proportion of votes, and the persons of whom the victorious group consisted, as well as by the minority opinion, which was signed by the delegates of no lesser powers than Great Britain, the United States, Japan, Belgium, Holland, etc. Obviously, the numbers, probably after some efficient diplomatic preparation, owned up to the French point of view—of the important powers, only Italy and Poland voted with France—whereas the votes which signify weight, quality, power, moral and political value, one and all fell in favor of the legal and theoretical possibility of a German-Austrian customs union. Even though the men who considered and took their decision upon the question before The Hague tribunal were jurists, there is no doubt that the division of votes is of political importance, and no doubt that through the judges' votes were revealed the political feelings and political interests that reacted to the German-Austrian minutes of March 19 like ice reacts to salt. It has grown evident that the diplomatic situation of the Reich is far better than anyone had suspected. For although we are ready to believe that the gowns of the tribunal's 15 judges can not be touched by the suspicion of party feeling or a bias of any kind, yet none of them can entirely rid himself of the contagious influence of his own country's public opinion and the interests of his own nation."

THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD an editorial appearing in this morning's Washington Post entitled "Great Britain at Geneva."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Post, Monday, February 8, 1932]

GREAT BRITAIN AT GENEVA

Viscount Robert Cecil's presentation of the British point of view on disarmament was more subtle than the blunt declaration of France's policy by André Tardieu, but at bottom it is no less selfish. M. Tardieu asks the world to organize an army for the protection of France; Viscount Cecil seeks the abolition of every weapon that Britain can not use to advantage, or which would be especially dangerous to Britain in time of war.

The policy suggested by the British delegate is deceptive, because it is based on so-called budgetary limitation. He would have the conference limit the sum that each nation might spend on armaments every year. In the first place, this method of limitation would discriminate against certain countries, foremost among which is the United States. In the second place, it carries no guaranty of disarmament.

The amount of money which a nation spends for national defense is not a true measure of its strength in armaments. Figures worked out by Senator HALE, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, show that it costs more to maintain the United States Navy than any other navy in the world. But the income of the United States is 5 times that of Great Britain, more than 7 times that of Germany, and 11 times that of France. The portion of the British national income that goes into naval projects is three times the portion of the American national income used for that purpose. Costs of naval construction and salaries paid to officers and sailors are much higher in America. Budgetary limitation that would disrupt the American standard of living, so far as the Navy is concerned, will not be tolerated at Geneva.

One nation may maintain twice as much armament as another with the same amount of money. Militant governments may compel men to serve in both naval and military forces without pay, or for a mere pittance. Governments might force commercial interests to supply munitions and reward them with monopolies or excessive tariffs. In a thousand ways a government can evade budgetary limitations on armaments. Such a provision would play directly into the hands of the militarists, giving rise to widespread suspicion and distrust.

It is amusing to note that Viscount Cecil, after suggesting this deceptive basis for disarmament, carefully demands a ban on all instruments of war that would be effective against Britain. The British Navy has bases in all parts of the world. It has use for only light cruisers that may be refueled often. Hence, Viscount Cecil urges "that there shall be built no more ships of more than 10,000-ton size." As the greatest naval and maritime power in the world, Britain is peculiarly vulnerable to submarines. Therefore, says Viscount Cecil, those vicious instruments of war ought to be abolished. France excels Britain in air strength, and so the British peace lover advocates the abolition of fighting aircraft. Anything that endangers Britain is an instrument of "aggressive warfare" and should be outlawed, in the opinion of Viscount Cecil.

On the whole, the British delegate's accomplishment is not far short of M. Tardieu's achievement. The latter raised a mountain in the path of disarmament, and the former has now dug a pit in the roadway and artfully concealed it under flowery invocations to world peace.

OKLAHOMA—ADDRESS BY FORMER REPRESENTATIVE CLAUDE WEAVER

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered at Valley Forge on December 13, last, by Hon. Claude Weaver, former Representative in Congress from Oklahoma, entitled "The Commonwealth of Oklahoma, a Heritage of Liberty."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends, I regret that Governor Murray could not himself accept the invitation to come to Valley Forge. I do not know any man who possesses a more accurate, a more intimate knowledge of American history than he or a more profound understanding of the philosophy of history. Certainly there is no man living who surpasses him in the lore of the Indian tribes and peoples. He is one of the great speakers of the world. Governor Murray could not come, and I am thrilled with pride that Governor Murray has commissioned me to represent my State this Oklahoma Day at Valley Forge. This Washington Memorial Chapel, with the dim religious light stealing through its storied windows, in its setting of divine beauty in God's great out-of-doors, is a poem in stone, a miracle of glorious architecture. Woodrow Wilson named it the shrine of the American people. It is a monument to the genius and the consecrated spirit of Dr. W. Herbert Burk, who has given his life to the building of this great church—a living force to make the world better by teaching men to follow in the Master's way. One hundred and fifty-four years have gone since that dark and gloomy winter when Washington and his patriot soldiers were camped upon these very hills. How little change in this historic place. The trees are still here, the forest realm of Penn, old fortifications, the very trenches the ragged soldiers dug, human habitations miles away, this minster in this solitude, the blue sky bending over all, and the crystal flood of Schuylkill River rolling to the sea. Valley Forge is not a town. It is a name—the symbol of heroic sacrifice and suffering, of patriotism and valor wherever the sun shall light the faces of civilized man to the last syllable of recorded time.

If I had the time and the gift of the historian, I should delight to tell the story of the American Revolution that began at Concord Bridge on the 19th of April, 1775, where "the embattled farmers stood and fired the shot heard round the world."

John Buttrick turned to his men and said, "Fire, fellow soldiers; for God's sake, fire." The Americans fired, the British retreated. Then and there began the retreat of British power from the American colonies; through seven weary and wasting years it continued. From Bunker Hill to Long Island, from Princeton, Trenton, and Saratoga, from the Brandywine, Monmouth, and Kings Mountain, through the bloody snow at Valley Forge, through the treachery of Arnold and Lee, through cabals and doubt and poverty and despair, but steadily urged by one great heart that strengthened the continent—the heart of George Washington—the British retreat went on from Concord Bridge and Lexington Green to the plains of Yorktown and the king's acknowledgment of American independence.

But I have promised to talk this day to those who hear me about Oklahoma—my own State, the product of the living generation, a newborn Commonwealth, "Wearing upon her baby brow the round and top of sovereignty."

I must needs begin with the name of Pushmataha.

Pushmataha, the Choctaw chieftain, traded the lands of his people east of the Mississippi River for the lands west of the Mississippi River, where now is my own State of Oklahoma—a land richer, more beautiful than the promised land flowing with milk and honey that greeted the rapt vision of Moses from the heights of Nebo.

I pause to pay tribute to this Indian warrior, statesman, orator, and prophet. The inscription upon his tombstone is no false epitaph: "Pushmataha was a warrior of great distinction. He was wise in council, eloquent in an extraordinary degree, and on all occasions and under all circumstances the white man's friend."

He was born to command and, though not the son of a chieftain, was elevated to lead his race by his own restless energy, extraordinary talents, indomitable will, and strength of character. No greater orator ever lived. He was a giant in size, but exquisitely molded, and his face, the mirror of all human passions, reflected the intense soul within. He had a voice of melting music, whose harpstrings were a lute, and in his own native tongue he was master of the grand harmonies of human speech. The oration delivered to the great Choctaw council of 1811 under the open sky, far in the forest wilds of Mississippi, made in answer to the fiery appeal of Tecumseh—the oration of Pushmataha, that kept the Choctaws from rebellion and maintained their friendship with the Americans, could it have been preserved—would have made him immortal as the old Greek, whose eloquence stirred the Athenian rabble with one voice to exclaim: "Let us arise and go against Philip." Pushmataha was the true forest-born Demosthenes.

Between the years 1830 and 1840 the Five Civilized Tribes—the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles—under provisions of treaties with the Federal Government, moved from their lands east of the Mississippi to their new homes in what was known for so many years as Indian Territory. The Five Civilized Tribes, transplanted from their eastern homes to trans-Mississippi solitudes, have in less than a hundred years attained a high civilization. The love of liberty is as strong in the Indian as in the Saxon race, and his was the boast of the free-born Robin Hood:

"I am as free as nature first made man.
Ere the base laws of servitude began,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran."

The Chickasaws, the Choctaws, and the Cherokees, in the experiment of self-government, will compare favorably with the governments of the Western States, created by the hardy pioneers who conquered the wilderness. They had written constitutions and written laws. They had legislatures composed of two houses, and a tribal chief, or governor, as the executive. They had courts and trial by jury to administer old-fashioned, plain, and simple justice. The Indians early learned the great truth that Alexander Campbell expressed in the maxim, "To educate the citizen is the first and imperative duty of the state." They spent large sums of money to establish free and common schools, founded academies of higher learning, and appropriated public moneys to educate the brightest youths of the nation in the higher education of eastern universities.

In the War between the States the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and the Cherokee warriors leagued with the soldiers of the South to repel the northern invader and to make common cause with their true friends, the southern people, in the defense of their native land.

With the coming of the railroads after the Civil War white settlers swarmed into the Indian country, and the Indians gave them generous welcome. The old Indian Territory was an ideal poor man's country, for here farmers could get the use of fertile land for low rent or none. The Indian courts, all powerful over the tribal members, had no jurisdiction over white men. The whites and Indians for years lived together in an anomalous social state with no government, no court, no taxes, and a man who would not pay his just debts was ostracized, for the obligation of honor was more binding among these primitive people than the attachment and sequestration writs of the boasted jurisprudence of the States.

The estimate that rated the Indian Territory as the Alsatia of refuge for criminals of other States did gross injustice to the population. The bandits and desperadoes were few in number, erratic and ill-starred characters, transient bubbles on the still stream, most of them killed by one another like the armed men who sprang from the dragon's teeth upon the Theban plain. The people in the general mass were peaceful and law-abiding, shrewd merchants, industrious and thrifty farmers, and cattlemen who prospered by grazing vast herds on the luxuriant native grasses.

When the government of the new State of Oklahoma was in the making, Choctaw, Cherokee, and Chickasaw Indians were in the legislature, were members of the constitutional convention, and were elected by the votes of white people to hold the highest offices in the State.

The Indian tribes had sold the western part of their rich domain to the Federal Government, and in the year 1889 a part of these public lands were opened to homestead settlement under the Federal laws. April 22, 1899, at high noon, at the voice of a silver bugle, the settlers swarmed into the favored land, 50,000 and more in a day. September 16, 1893, the Cherokee Strip was likewise opened and the mad rush repeated, and in August, 1901, the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache lands were partitioned to settlers by lottery. The Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory of the Five Civilized Tribes together were admitted to the Union November 16, 1907, as Oklahoma, the forty-sixth State, and a new star glittered on the flag of a nation.

It was altogether fitting and proper that the Executive proclamation of Oklahoma's statehood should bear the signature of Theodore Roosevelt, the commander of the Oklahoma Rough Riders in the Spanish War, who had himself in joyous youth known the wild and free existence of a ranchman on the Great Plains and among the Rockies in the habitat of the deer, the elk, the buffalo, and the grizzly bear.

In the beginning or formative period of our State we had not reached the evil days when corporate greed by insidious, secret, and lucrative employments endeavors to debauch our public officers. The ablest men of the twin Territories regarded it as an honor to be elected to the constitutional convention and were quick to respond to their country's call.

The convention of delegates that met at Guthrie, the capital city of Oklahoma Territory, in the year 1906 to frame a constitution for the new State brought out of obscurity men of great parts, afterwards distinguished in public life, none more so than William H. Murray, president of the constitutional convention, speaker of the house of representatives of the first legislature, Member of the Federal Congress for four years, and now, as Governor of the State of Oklahoma, known throughout the world as a constructive statesman, an executive who does things, and a fighter who wins the battles for the people.

Pioneers wrote the Oklahoma constitution, and the new State was nursed by "stern men with empires in their brains, strong-backed, brown-handed, and upright as the pines."

While it was the history of the ancient world that a thousand years scarce served to form a state, the government of the new State of Oklahoma came into being as the blue-eyed goddess sprang from the brain of Jove, full-orbed and glorious at birth.

I could assemble figures to show the unequaled natural wealth of Oklahoma. It has immeasurable forests of pine and hardwood. Seven staple crops from rich soils produce an hundredfold. That old miser, the sun, in long ages gone, stored treasures of coal under the ground, almost untouched and beyond calculation. In oil and natural gas my State surpasses in quantity and equals in quality the oil fields of your own Pennsylvania, that made your great State rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

Of these things I do not boast, for after all the best crop that a State can produce is people—citizens, law loving and God fearing. "By the soul only the nations shall be great and free."

Oklahoma is a part of the Louisiana Purchase—a monument to the vision of Thomas Jefferson. On March 26, 1850, Salmon P. Chase arose in his place in the Senate of the United States and gave utterance to these prophetic words:

"Beyond the Alleghenies, into the midst of the broad Northwest, behold on every side his monument. These thronged cities, these flourishing villages, these cultivated fields, these million happy homes of prosperous, free men; these churches, these schools, these asylums for the unfortunate and the helpless; these institutions of education, religion, and humanity; these great States, great in their present resources, but greater far in the mighty energies by which the resources of the future are to be developed—these are the monuments of Jefferson."

Oklahoma has spent millions ungrudgingly for asylums for the unfortunate, for free and common schools, its colleges, and its university of the first class. These are her jewels—the farms, the homes, the proud cities that man made, the beautiful country that God made; above all, the village church that lifts its spire a silent finger that points to heaven.

Measured by the hourglass of the swift-flying years, it seems but yesterday since Oklahoma was the lonely land of the covered wagon and the nomadic cowman; where the wolf's long howl broke the silence of the starry night, the goldenrod waved in the wind above the low hillock of the settler's dugout, and purple mists brooded over the primal solitude of the rolling hills.

The 42 years since Oklahoma Territory was peopled with white American citizens have witnessed a development in science, education, invention, transportation, and mechanics unparalleled for a like period in all the history of the world; and with our own eyes we have seen the building of a great American Commonwealth, vital with all the elements of human progress, the heir to all the ages, in the foremost files of time.

The people of Oklahoma are a composite, descended from Huguenot and Catholic, Roundhead and Cavalier, English and German, and Scotch-Irish and Indian—a strange blending of the keen-witted Yankee and the chivalrous sons of the old South. The Oklahoma constitution is rich with the spoils of time. It embodies the spirit of liberty won in parliaments and conventions and congresses and on the battlefield through the slow centuries of Runnymede to Gettysburg.

The people of Oklahoma are the owners of a priceless heritage. We have English, by which I mean Anglo-Saxon, civilization. We speak the tongue that Shakespeare spake, the faith and morals hold that Milton held. We have the English common law, sanctified by the wisdom of England's greatest thinkers, and hallowed by the struggles for liberty of England's noblest patriots—handed down to us by a liberty-loving and tyrant-hating ancestry for 1,000 years. We have divorcement of church and state, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, and the largest measure of individual liberty. We have the right to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness.

We have statute laws and a written Constitution whereby our fathers and ourselves have by self-imposed restraints guarded against injustice and the passion folly, or madness of the hour. We have the Federal Constitution with its wise system of checks, balances, and securities against impulsive, prejudiced, or extreme legislation—the greatest work of the greatest age of the greatest men in all the history of this world.

We have our own State government created by ourselves, republican in form but vital with the spirit of a living democracy—a people's government providing for direct primaries and the initiative and the referendum.

We have the bill of rights transcribed from Magna Chata, and above all the right of trial by jury and of local self-government, the ark of the covenant of liberty.

These immortal principles and institutions of free government belong to Oklahoma to be guarded with eternal vigilance by her children and her children's children forever.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] has the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield, so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield for that purpose?

Mr. HULL. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Couzens	Kean	Schall
Bailey	Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Keyes	Shipstead
Barbour	Dickinson	King	Smith
Barkley	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Bingham	Fess	Lewis	Steiwer
Black	Fletcher	Logan	Stephens
Blaine	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Glass	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Glenn	McNary	Townsend
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Trammell
Broussard	Gore	Morrison	Tydings
Bulkley	Hale	Moses	Vandenberg
Bulow	Harris	Neely	Wagner
Byrnes	Hastings	Norbeck	Walcott
Capper	Hawes	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hayden	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hebert	Patterson	Watson
Connally	Howell	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hull	Reed	White

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, the derangement, dislocation, and chaos of American and world economic affairs for more than two years past is too deep-seated to be of sudden or surface origin. The roots of the present domestic depression, unprecedented in its extent and intensity, extend far back through the past 10-year period. Any implied criticism I may offer in discussing this problem is intended to be constructive and not merely destructive.

Following the war, after America had experienced a complete transformation from a debtor and partially developed Nation to the greatest creditor and surplus-producing country in the world, every lesson of human experience called for a careful stock taking of our changed political, industrial, and general economic conditions, and the adoption of such modified and constructive policies as were manifestly necessary from every standpoint of wise leadership and enlightened statesmanship. America at this stage was truly at the crossroads, when the most momentous decision that ever could arise in peace time became necessary. Would our national leaders have this country ignore realities and carelessly float along, clinging blindly to the narrow and disastrous policy of economic isolation or aloofness or seclusion—every nation strenuously endeavoring to live unto itself—or would they exhibit vision and constructive ability by proclaiming modernized economic policies which recognized that we are living in a new day in which our impregnable home market must be supplemented by adequate foreign markets for our ever-increasing surpluses, and that the satisfactory disposition of such surplus production has become an indispensable factor in our permanent progress and our sound and balanced prosperity?

Tragic to relate, our national leadership proceeded to perpetrate a colossal and epochal mistake of judgment by complacently pursuing the former course of aloofness, with the result that they have not enunciated a single new economic truth since 1920, nor achieved a single major accomplishment; and it is not unfair to charge that their wild and mad pursuit of economic isolation, which contemplates that every nation shall become more and more a hermit nation, constituted the greatest single underlying cause of the awful panic which burst upon our country in 1929. It is not unjust, further to say, that those in control of our Government during the past two years of this depression have been utterly incapable of developing a program setting forth basic causes and basic remedies. The Federal administration, for example, is only able at this late panic stage to propose a succession of emergency measures—neither new nor original—each of which is professedly a palliative or tonic for the effects—not the causes—of the existing depression. These measures, at the most, provide only temporary or first-aid treatment of economic ills that are deep-seated and fundamental, and the offering of each palliative has been at least one year late.

The Hoover moratorium, to be specific, relates alone to an extension of a single installment payment, while ignoring the real fundamentals of our foreign-debt situation comprising $11,000,000,000, and especially ignoring those impediments to the payment of our debts which it is our duty to aid in removing or lessening; the special, belated, and temporary tax levy requested by Secretary Mellon is to help the Federal administration out of the greatest Treasury deficit in fiscal annals, into which it stumbled, through what seemed to be incompetent management, with insufficient thought in the past of a permanent tax system that would be stable, adequate, and equitable; the appropriation of $125,000,000 for relief of the farm-loan system is only for the temporary purpose of helping it to tide over the present panic; proposals for the relief of the unemployed, while most urgent and meritorious, stop short of the paramount problem of providing permanent employment by the adoption of sound measures for business recovery; and the so-called Reconstruction Finance Corporation is still another temporary proposal to aid railroads, banks, and other industries in acute financial distress under existing panic conditions. The depression has reached such a low level that this country, acting alone, can substantially improve business activities, and to this desirable and attainable end every citizen should render whole-hearted teamwork. We can not, however, expect such a full, permanent, and balanced state of prosperity as the general welfare of the American people requires without very marked world improvement along with our own. Furthermore, a mere local state of business improvement would be more or less uncertain, uneven, and at any time subject to dislocating world conditions.

It is the irony of fate that the present administration, which gaily rode into power upon the plea that it alone could secure prosperity to the people, now finds it imperative to call in Democratic help to resurrect and put in operation the biggest Democratic war-emergency agency, as the only means of halting the existing panic. The administration is entitled to whatever credit attaches for having suggested these belated emergency steps to arrest—not fundamentally to cure—the depression after it had raged for more than two years. It is to be commended even if it does no more than borrow a Democratic war agency to cure the effects of its own mistakes. Since ours was the first nation to plunge into the panic, our old-guard group of Republican friends dare not specify any other country as its place of origin, although they are particular to locate it as far away from America as possible. From their vague and conflicting statements one might plausibly conclude that the panic originated in the great Arabian desert, or somewhere near the middle of the Indian Ocean, but that in any event the Republican administration had nothing remotely to do with it.

The thankless but cheerful task of cooperating to every reasonable extent in the enactment and application of the temporary remedies thus proposed by the Hoover administration, one of which, the Finance Corporation, is thoroughly obnoxious in peace time, is the least phase of democratic duty. Democrats, in addition, face the tremendous responsibility of offering a sound and constructive program analyzing basic causes and offering basic remedies with respect to the domestic and international conditions to the extent that the latter affect us. Few things could be more patent to-day than the extreme necessity for new leadership with vision and capacity to devise such program to afford relief to our hopelessly dislocated and chaotic business and general economic conditions.

The President dismisses the largest single measure of domestic and international aid with the flippant suggestion that the Tariff Commission can deal with the task of readjusting our tariff and commercial policy to every satisfactory extent, thus exhibiting the same utterly shortsighted and disastrous leadership that he did when he caused the enactment of the monstrous Hawley-Smoot Act, and when he failed to foresee the coming of the panic, and when for many months after it did come he was unable to recognize it or to interpret its extent and intensity.

Democrats, I hope, will offer basic plans designed to establish a more stable foundation for our financial, commercial, and general economic structure, including restoration of confidence, revival of credit, economy, balancing budgets, monetary stabilization, restoration of foreign trade and of our declining merchant marine, moderation of tariffs, liberalization of commercial policy, and other domestic proposals to rehabilitate agriculture and to secure stable business recovery, with the resultant permanent employment of labor. These will also include sane, practical international coordination and cooperation to the extent suggested by our own enlightened self-interest—cooperation, however, within the limits of our Constitution and our traditions, in the light of our new place in the world economic situation. The world is torn between many of the views of the extreme isolationist and the extreme internationalist. A middle course is sounder and far more possible of early accomplishment; so both classes of extremists' views might well be left in abeyance during this grave emergency.

This Nation to-day is incapable of administering the gold standard, of taking the lead in effecting in an orderly and healthy manner a proper redistribution of gold in the various sections of the world and suitable monetary stabilization. High tariff and creditor countries have no right, by artificial methods to force a vastly excessive and lopsided accumulation of the world's gold and then make no use of it. Nor is our country qualified by the necessary information, experience, and financial machinery to take the place abdicated by England of financing world commerce and, in other tremendously vital respects, performing our functions as the center of world finance and trade. International cooperative action is also pressing to liberalize existing exchange restrictions and unshackle finance and commerce between nations. Similar action is necessary to restore the international credit structure, if the present demoralized and utterly collapsed domestic business conditions are to be brought back to a level of balanced and permanent prosperity.

The Hoover administration, charged with the responsibility of official and economic leadership, is utterly without plans or programs dealing basically with any of these deep-seated problems and conditions which stand in the way of sound and full business recovery. This leadership, instead, holds out the barren and hopeless view that the only treatment of serious depressions relates to their effects and not their causes and that all nations are liable within a half dozen years, after emerging from one destructive panic, to plunge into another perhaps still more destructive.

It is my individual belief that if intrusted with power the Democratic Party would have the ability to interpret accurately our postwar political, economic, and moral conditions, to propose fundamental policies, and the courage to carry them into effect. Nothing conceivable is more needed in this country to-day than a thorough campaign of industrial, business, and general economic education. If the American people would study and master the underlying causes responsible for the course and developments in these respects from 1920 until 1932 they would render their own welfare and the cause of efficient government a great and lasting service. It would be tragic if they should persist in neglecting these vital phases of our national life until they become hopelessly impoverished by reason of evils and abuses due to such neglect. The economic policies adopted and pursued after 1920 shed a flood of light upon the causes of the panic in 1929.

Following the war, no nation in history—not Egypt, nor Greece, nor Rome, nor England—was ever so completely equipped in every essential respect for world leadership in finance and commerce as ours. We possessed boundless gold, credit, raw materials, foodstuffs, a great merchant marine, horsepower, a manufacturing plant unequaled in volume and efficiency, relatively the lowest interest and tax rates, superior transportation and communication facilities, a location nearly midway between Europe and Asia, an overproduction capacity in scores of great industries aggregating twenty to thirty billions of dollars. The world commercially and financially was at our feet—at our beck and call. This country unquestionably had the foundations then laid for the development of the greatest commerce, finance, and civilization of all time. America, thus exceptionally equipped to lead the world to heights of wealth and civilization undreamed of, had but to gird herself, yield to the law of manifest destiny, and go forward as the supreme world factor economically and morally. With its matchless facilities for production and trade, and with only a moderate effort to avail itself of the marvelous opportunity that beckoned, our country only had to embrace suitable economic policies to supplement our impregnable home market with the maximum of a steadily increasing foreign market that would absorb in an orderly and profitable way, every ounce of our surplus manufacturing, agricultural, and mineral production. Already, on an exporting basis, we could easily become the greatest nation in history.

It was a colossal blunder that dominant forces, both selfish and shortsighted, decreed the opposite course for America and the world, under American leadership—the course known as economic isolation. The biggest result of this fatal and benighted action is, that after being first doped half to death and led through a veritable fool's paradise, the American people, save a small group, find themselves back in a worse condition to-day than they were 11 years ago, while the greatest opportunity for human progress within a thousand years has been cruelly and ruthlessly thrown away. Civilization must have shrieked when its world leader thus headed back to purely primitive practices. By every sort of propaganda public sentiment after 1920 was aroused almost to an insane pitch in support of the monstrous theory that every country should live in seclusion and unto itself; producing, regardless of cost, every commodity humanly possible. This mad policy of seclusion was fairly shouted to all parts of the world by the blind, selfish, and, in many respects, dumb leadership in charge of our Government.

The workshop of this planet after the war comprised the United States, England, Germany, France, Belgium, and one or two other small European countries, with a population of 350,000,000, and other peoples aggregating 1,500,000,000 produced the chief portion of raw materials and foodstuffs. While many countries had increased their productive capacities during the war, including some crude manufacturing by the less advanced nations, it was evident that the highly developed manufacturing countries already mentioned could easily regain most all of their former world supremacy. The pre-war equilibrium between the production and distribution of these three groups of commodities would thus have been restored. The operation, however, of the obsolete and hopelessly outgrown pre-war policy, under which each nation proceeded to fence itself off by insurmountable tariff walls and other financial and trade barriers—all under militant American leadership—proved fatal to this desirable end. More than 2,000 of our plants have moved abroad.

Nothing could be more inevitable than that under a policy which offered the maximum of artificial encouragement for the increase of every kind of production in every nation, and would at the same time restrict all international commerce to the very minimum, it would be impossible for an equilibrium between production and consumption to be long preserved, that the processes of exchange and distribution would soon break down. This is precisely what occurred in 1928–29, and the collapse would have occurred some years earlier save for our huge foreign loans and other temporary saving agencies.

After the Macedonian cry for high tariffs and severe restrictions on foreign trade went up in December, 1920, when the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives opened hearings preparatory to the enactment of the Fordney tariff act of September, 1922, most other nations treated this as the signal for the speedy erection by them of abnormally high tariffs and other trade barriers. From 1920 to 1924—and I direct special attention to this phase of development—England, France, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Austria, Spain, Australia, Turkey, Persia, Japan, Argentina, and other important nations moved in solid column, with America at their head, in reckless support of this policy of economic extremism. Europe alone erected 27 separate and almost airtight tariff compartments, while other countries were madly following suit. It was during this period that the demand for huge tariff excesses became rampant. America was preaching the utter fallacy that high tariffs insure prosperity, including high wages and high living standards. Naturally all the other countries felt that if high wages were a mere matter of legislative enactment, they would thus proceed to place all wage earners on the American level.

Our Republican friends hastened to pass the farmers' tariff bill in May, 1921, with their guaranty that it would afford prosperity to the farmers. They also proceeded with the work of framing the Fordney general tariff act, although manufacturing costs were as easily obtainable from the planet Mars as from other countries of the world during this period of depreciated currencies, dislocated exchanges, and hopelessly fluctuating prices. The Fordney Act was justified mainly as an agency to prevent sporadic imports from abroad due to depreciated currencies. There was no other excuse, because for the four years 1919 to 1922 we exported $9,600,000,000 of agricultural, manufacturing, and other products more than we imported, thereby giving American labor employment to produce an exportable surplus of near $10,000,000,000 of commodities above imports.

Naturally, none would urge tariff taxation from the standpoint of equity, because it is essentially a class tax. None would urge it to reduce transportation costs, because it substantially increases such costs. None would urge it as a means of encouraging export trade, because it seriously obstructs export trade. None would urge it as a means of reducing domestic production costs, because it materially increases such costs. None would urge it in reduction of living costs, because it boosts living costs. None would urge it as a means of promoting fair and friendly trade methods and practices, because it invites or challenges trade reprisals and retaliations. None would urge it as an aid to the payment of our foreign debts, with interest, because it seriously obstructs such payments. None would urge it except those who would increase the prices of their own production. Even the chief beneficiaries are not so enamored with high tariffs as honestly to approve tariff protection for materials they must purchase, and they strangely reject the principle whenever it burdens the cost of their materials. This is due to the axiomatic fact that tariffs operate as a simple transfer of property of the person or producer who does not get its benefit to the producer who does, and is thereby able to increase his prices to the former.

There has been a tremendous evolution in tariffs since Alexander Hamilton prescribed an average rate of about 8½ per cent to protect young industries until the coming of the Smoot-Hawley Act containing scores of items and classifications carrying rates from 100 per cent to 700 per cent. Prior to the World War ours was a young and partially developed country with vast natural resources. Manufacturing industries had scarcely reached the stage of supplying all of the home market and had no other ambition, while we exported increasing amounts of foodstuffs and raw materials, in part to pay interest and installments on our foreign indebtedness of nearly $5,000,000,000. We were entirely indifferent to any further development of foreign trade. We sat supinely here at home for a generation before the recent war and permitted England, Germany, and other countries to act as our brokers to buy and sell raw materials and certain foodstuffs, and specialty articles for us in every part of the world, to their annual profits of several hundred millions. We paid them vast sums also for insurance and freight.

This purely primitive course meant that we would never have a merchant marine, never learn the mechanism of international finance and commerce, and never become a trading nation, but would pay these countries still other hundreds of millions thus to serve us. It is true that from 1900 to 1914, for example, we naturally would increase our exports of foodstuffs and raw materials many hundreds of millions, while importing increased quantities of such materials as sugar, wool, tobacco, flax and hemp products, ferroalloys, precious metals, furs, novelties, and other commodities which we produced in insufficient quantities or not at all. Our Government most of the time was in the clutches of the chief tariff beneficiaries who were accustomed to pile on tariffs with a steam shovel, so to speak, without any concern about the difference in domestic and foreign costs. Rates were stacked up high enough not only to protect the most inefficient industry but the most inefficient business in that industry. It was deemed highly impertinent for any question to be asked as to whether a business or industry was seeking tariffs to shelter inadequate plants, obsolete machinery, inefficient management, or other indefensible conditions of production, as was generally the case.

The country was floating along in this idle, indifferent, sleepy, and carefree manner, almost like Japan when Admiral Perry sailed in and awakened her, when the World War made its appearance and completely changed our entire financial, industrial, and commercial situation—a vast change, without design or effort on our part, that left our pre-war tariff and commercial policy hopelessly academic and out of date. Whatever its merits or demerits during the pre-war period, it gets us nowhere to discuss them now. It early became evident, however, that the Bourbon element of our Republican friends, under the domination of the chief tariffs beneficiaries would, following the war, endeavor to build all our economic policies around the doctrine of extreme nationalism, with discrimination or retaliation as our chief commercial policy, ignoring the plain economic truth that the future progress and prosperity of the country required expanding production and expanding foreign markets. Our whole economic structure was to rest upon subsidies, bounties, rebates, subventions, valorizations, price fixing, and numerous other artificial restrictions and devices.

The Fordney Act was frankly prohibitive as to most staple commodities of a competitive nature, and in the measure of its tariff benefits it was without any previous rival. Only novelties, specialties, curios, particular patterns or designs, including sugar, wool, and other commodities we do not produce in sufficient quantities or other articles supplemental rather than competitive were able to negotiate our tariff walls after 1922. Nearly three-fourths of the rates and classificaions of this law operated as an embargo. As late as 1927 approximately 75 per cent of total duties derived under this act showed an average ad valorem rate of over 55 per cent, the highest in United States history. During the unsound and abnormal business years following 1921, due chiefly to our loans abroad, we imported on an increasing scale, amounting to $3,000,000,000 by 1930, foodstuffs and raw materials that we either did not produce at all, such as silk, rubber, coffee, tin, and burlaps, or produced in insufficient quantities, such as sugar and wool. Had not these immense quantities of raw materials been thus imported, millions of American laborers employed in the silk, automobile, rubber, and other home industries would, instead, be swelling the ranks of the present 7,000,000 unemployed wage earners. The Bourbon isolationist ignores our exports of $3,781,000,000 for 1930, the production of which gave employment to more than a million American wage earners, whereas most of our imports are not produced in this country, and hence do not displace labor.

The usual high-tariff system only contemplates a manufacturing output that will meet home consumption. It breaks down completely and becomes a serious impediment when a creditor nation produces substantial surpluses of manufactured and agricultural products which must be sold elsewhere. This is true for the reason that high-tariff beneficiaries usually welcome every person who joins in demanding any rates he may desire on his products. This policy insures wider support for the general scheme. The inevitable result is that not only raw materials, semimanufactures, and finished manufactures but many materials we do not produce in sufficient quantities or at all and others the production of which is not economoically justifiable are plastered all over with tariffs. These gross excesses mean increased prices, higher artificial costs of production of finished manufactures, and a corresponding disadvantage in competing in international markets. Tariffs beget tariffs. Universal resentment, bitterness, and general economic strife gradually arose out of the world tariff increases under American leadership from 1920 to 1924–25.

In vain did many of us plead as early as 1920 that the Government must choose between the collection of its foreign debts of $11,000,000,000 and a great foreign trade that would absorb our ever-increasing domestic surpluses on the one hand and ultrahigh tariffs, burdensome surpluses, unemployment and severe trade restrictions, and bitter trade wars on the other. Even a blind person can now see that our surplus production has destroyed our home price levels and that our debt payments are hopelessly impeded by our own policies. Our debtors, however, must first propose a general lowering of tariffs before seeking debt reductions.

It mattered not that nations in the past have derived the greatest profits from their international trade; that the wonderful cities of Tyre, Sidon, Palmyra, Carthage, and Rome of the ancient world, and Venice, Amsterdam, Spain, and London of the modern period were able to levy tribute on the world, to become its financial and commercial center, and to gather from its remotest parts the wealth, learning, and culture of every race. It mattered not that America was infinitely better equipped to maintain world financial and commercial supremacy, which had fallen into her lap, than were any of these countries of the past.

Never did our Nation after 1920 so urgently need big-brained men with creative imagination, vision, courage, and initiative to pioneer and to carry American trade conquests to every part of the world, developing new trade routes, additional markets, and materials.

The average person is taught that trade between nations means the displacement more or less of established domestic production and trade of one country by that of another. Few things are farther from the truth in actual practice. The Lincoln car does not displace the Ford. International trade is chiefly barter, or a mutually profitable exchange of surpluses by different countries, either directly or in a triangular manner. It means, too, that a nation goes out into the world and locates and develops new markets for its surpluses, as did Tyre, Venice, Amsterdam, and London. Resolute action on our part, however, is required if we would maintain our rightful place in world commerce. Extreme protectionism has now gone so nearly to seed that, as President Hoover virtually suggested recently, the Nation will buy nothing from abroad that can possibly be produced at home at any cost. This very practice under the shelter of world embargo tariffs has glutted all markets and constituted the chief underlying cause of the present serious business dislocation and maladjustment of gold. And this gold can not be healthfully redistributed until trade obstructions are lessened.

The public should realize that, in addition to exchange between countries of commodities the purchaser does not produce, there is a large range of necessary or very desirable commodities, the production of which is not economically justifiable, or which are produced in wholly minor or insignificant quantities, compared with home demands. There are many assortments and kinds of novelties, specialties, patterns, and other articles, not competitive either materially or at all with our home production, which Americans widely insist upon importing. These classes of imports enable other countries to purchase our more burdensome surpluses, such as agricultural products, textiles, automobiles, machinery, and a large range of others. Trade among nations is a mutually profitable affair.

If I am correct in my view that our home market must be supplemented by a growing foreign trade for the purpose of stable and desirable domestic prosperity, it is clear that no more fatal blow could have been inflicted upon international commerce than the combined policy of tariff, trade, and general isolation which was largely written into the Fordney Act in 1922 and copied by most other commercial nations. Its every intendment and implication had the effect of impeding, choking, and reducing trade among nations to the lowest level.

This brand of Bourbon seclusion includes every means and method to enable a country to avoid economic contacts with another. Embargo tariffs; the narrowest trade policy; bitter opposition to any sort of international cooperation or coordination, no matter how necessary to the economic well-being of such nation itself, such as the maintenance of the international finance, credit, exchange, and trade situation which no one country can deal with; a network of reprisals, retaliations, exchange restrictions, partial embargoes on imports, and most other weapons of nonintercourse, financially and commercially.

I denounce this narrow and selfish spirit of economic nationalism as the greatest danger to world peace to-day. Furthermore, it more seriously threatens the world with bankruptcy than war itself. When each country uses every means to block each other's exports, peoples can neither sell nor buy each other's surpluses, so that both trade and purchasing power are dried up. But the theory is that we are to get rich by fencing ourselves off from the world and proceeding industriously to collecting off of each other subsidies, bounties, taxes, rebates, bonuses, profits, and every other sort of gain out of which one person can fleece another.

It is amazing to see that world trade for 1931 is more than $240,000,000,000 less than it would have been from 1913 under the pre-war rate of normal and annual increase, while that of the United States, according to like calculation, was behind $1,629,000,000 for 1930 alone. World commerce for 1931 is $20,270,000,000, or a little below that of 1913. Our own exports have likewise fallen short. At the pre-war rate of growth world commerce for 1931 would be $48,771,000,000, instead of $20,000,000,000, while the share of America in this deficiency would be about $3,333,000,000.

Suppose this Nation had had access to that $3,333,000,000 of the foreign markets for its cotton, its copper, its automobile products, and hundreds of other vast surpluses of great industries in this country. It would require no intelligence to state the result. It requires no flash of genius for one readily to see that this collapse of international trade and the consequent inability of nations to effect even the most desirable and profitable exchanges of their respective surpluses presents the original cause of the breakdown of the processes of exchange and distribution.

William McKinley stated a living economic truth at Buffalo when, just prior to his death, he said:

> We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. * * * The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. * * * Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

President Herbert Hoover in his Boston speech in 1928 said:

> To insure continuous employment and maintain our wages we must find a profitable market for our surpluses. * * * The Great War brought into bold relief the utter dependence of nations upon foreign trade. * * * Our total volume of exports translates itself into employment for 2,400,000 families, while its increase in the last seven years has interpreted itself into livelihood for 500,000 additional families in the United States.

President Hoover some months later, when in Brazil, said:

> International commerce is the lifeblood of civilization.

But why should I tire myself and the Senate by quoting all disinterested testimony in order to establish an economic truth self-evident to all save the chief beneficiaries of governmental favoritism in this country?

No economic falsehood ever deceived as many credulous people as the stock phrase that America only exports about 10 per cent of her production and that home consumption of the 90 per cent completely controls our economic situation. In the first place, instead of all American industries exporting 10 per cent each of their production, a few dozen of our greatest industries, on the prosperity of which the prosperity of the entire Nation absolutely depends, are obliged to export not 10 per cent but a large proportion of their production. We must export 50 to 60 per cent of raw cotton, 25 per cent of wheat, 53 per cent of rye, 40 per cent of tobacco, 30 per cent of lard, 30 to 35 per cent of petroleum products, several hundred thousand automobiles, surplus coal, machinery, leather, furniture, copper, oil, lumber, the various textiles, shoes, cement, naval stores, paints, lead, rubber manufactures, electrical machinery, tools, and increasing surpluses of scores of other industries.

Secondly, the price received abroad for these major export surpluses, as a rule, fixes the home price for the entire amount produced and consumed here. Naturally the grower would sell at home as long as the domestic price is, by the least margin, higher than in the world market. The utter fraud of this 10 per cent theory is now confessed by Bourbon Republican leaders when they set up the plea that the panic was due to world conditions. If, with only 10 per cent trade connection with the world, the world can inflict upon America the most disastrous panic in human history, how much worse panic could it inflict upon this country if we had a 20 per cent or a 50 per cent trade relation with the world? This would seem to be a 100 per cent panic based upon a 10 per cent trade connection with the outside, viewed from the standpoint of our benighted and archaic friends who champion the other view.

President Hoover, in an address to the National Shoe and Leather Exposition in 1921, frankly stated the truth when he said:

> I may say in passing that our whole standard of living greatly depends upon our imports and that our exports are the great balance wheel for our productions. Exports are vital to the stabilization of our industries, of price levels, of wages, and of employment. * * * While many of the causes of the present depression lie within our own borders, yet there may be no recovery from these hard times for many years to come if we neglect our economic relations abroad. Even if we lower our vision of civilization in this crisis solely to our own selfish economic interest, we are yet mightily concerned in the recuperation of the entire world. The hard times that knock at every cottage door to-day come from Europe. No tariffs, no embargoes, no navies, no armies can ever defend us from these invasions.

The issue is sharply raised as to whether a country that has taken front rank of the world in foreign trade shall pusillanimously shrink back and abdicate in favor of second or third rate nations and assume a decadent course, as have Spain and China and numerous other countries.

The American people should realize that during recent centuries economic considerations lie back of all major world movements. Naturally other civilized countries with overproductive capacity have always entered the struggle for world markets. Most wars for several centuries owe their origin to economic causes. The seeds of the late World War were clearly of economic origin, just as Japan is primarily concerned for materials and markets in connection with her present occupation of Manchuria and other parts of China. It is utter folly to discuss plans for military peace and ignore a state of economic war as it exists now and has existed throughout the world during much of the past 10 years. The policy of national seclusion, which must now be apparent to every person, breeds these very conditions of bitter economic strife, instead of preventing them. The only remedy is a system of liberal trade agreements pledging fair, equal, and friendly trade treatment and trade relations.

It is a gross reflection upon our present civilization that those in charge of our Government, seemingly in the grip of blind and selfish reactionary forces which were incapable of recognizing the present panic when it came, are wholly unwilling to take any step toward liberalizing the restrictions, discriminations, and other unfair or unsound economic practices responsible for the present state of bitter trade crimination and recrimination, but instead are actually seeking by still higher tariff and similar obstructions to make more acute the present world economic controversies.

The tariff action of the British House of Commons last week marks the culmination of an 11-year period of the most amazing high-tariff stampede under American leadership throughout the world in all fiscal annals. It perhaps is just as well for this policy of virtual economic suicide thus to run its course, so that the reaction will all the sooner permit the practical common sense of the enlightened nations to assert itself. It is sufficient to note that under this deadly policy trade among nations has been whittled down to the very minimum, and the British action will drive it still lower. In 1929 we sold England $848,000,000 of goods and purchased only $329,000,000. England now proposes to tax 75 per cent of the goods she purchases from us. The patent effect of this action by England is to prove that governments have had more to do with the present panic than with any other in all the past.

Many of us frequently since the war have pointed to the limitless world-trade opportunities beckoning to this country. In 1910 the isolationist believed that South American trade of a billion dollars was at the maximum, whereas it had reached $1,900,000,000 in 1930, with their 60,000,000 population, and with any sort of effort to develop sound and liberal trade relations we alone could have had this commerce to $3,000,000,000 at present. The 12,000,000 people of Central America and the West Indies are not included. The Panama Canal leads across the Pacific, where there are more than a billion people hopelessly underfed and underclothed and with but nominal purchasing power, peoples only awaiting ever since the war the cooperation of some enlightened, progressive country that would encourage them to put on highway and other construction programs and teach them to progress in other thoroughly productive lines, the effect of which would be to create a substantial purchasing power through which their standards would gradually be raised as were ours in past generations. The purchasing power of the 480,000,000 Chinese population is only $10 per capita. The least effort within past years would have induced him to raise this to $50, with a resultant reservoir of new purchasing power of $1,500,000,000. A forward-looking nation would likewise have turned to India, with her 325,000,000 population, whose present purchasing power is only $35 per capita. The production of Asia and the Pacific islands is desired by us, and in most respects not competitive, whereas our more advanced processes of production are universally desired by the Orient. We continue to buy more from that part of the world than we sell—and that is a sad commentary on our enterprise.

Instead of pursuing this wise course of constructive leadership and international-trade cooperation, we promptly entered into a treaty with Japan and other countries in 1921 under the terms of which all economic and military control west of Hawaii was in effect turned over to Japan, while our dominant national leaders shut their eyes and embraced the most extreme phases of trade isolation. Does any sane person imagine that if the commercial nations since 1920 had kept trade barriers liberalized enough for the nations to effect no more than mutually profitable exchanges of their respective surpluses, we would to-day be experiencing the chief effects of the existing panic, including the maldistribution of gold?

We persisted, however, in facing inward instead of outward, and in our Bourbon isolation vast surpluses of gold, credit, and production developed, and speculative and gambling fever gradually set up. The Florida boom came first. We then heard of the Coolidge stock-market boom during which vast watered-stock issues, split-ups, stock rights, and other supposedly precious paper properties were dumped on a gullible public to the tune of $50,000,000,000. The excited population was regaled also during these years by the cry of "Coolidge economy and tax reduction," although nobody stopped to observe that appropriations were steadily increasing and that the volume of taxes was not being reduced. Everyone was making vast paper profits and hastening to invest them, and much credit besides, in houses, lands, travel, and luxuries at several prices. Fast living, overspending, and all manner of excesses undreamed of became the rage. The future for many years was hopelessly discounted in every way.

In vain did many of us each year point out that this was a purely temporary, artificial, and false state of business activities; that they were hopelessly lopsided, uncertain, unsound, and created mainly by high-pressure salesmanship; that more than 50,000,000 of the total population dependent upon the textile, the coal, the agricultural, the leather, and other industries were experiencing a severe depression, and not prosperity of any brand through these years beginning with 1921. There were never such fantastic exhibitions, performances, and orgies since the world began. The great American reservoir of idle gold and idle credit was utilized to develop the greatest stock-market craze and the wildest gambling pit in history. Amazing to contemplate, most of the investment bankers and economists, backed by the Coolidge and Hoover administrations, kept step and touched elbows with all these crazed forces of speculation, whose mad leadership was rushing most of our 120,000,000 population on to their financial and economic doom. They characterized this period as the "new economic era of perpetual prosperity" in which poverty would soon be abolished. As had occurred in many past campaigns, that talismanic word "prosperity" was again dramatized by our cunning adversary and used overtime for strictly partisan purposes. The fact that in 1928 the term "profitless prosperity" was used by a few sane persons to describe some phases of these whirling activities failed to put a single victim on his guard. By 1929 most available domestic credit and $3,000,000,000 of the most liquid capital of Europe had been drawn into this seething New York stock-market debauch. Until the financial structures abroad were thus weakened, there were not any signs of serious panic conditions in those countries.

It was perfectly patent to the normal person that these utterly chimerical conditions could not last, and so the bubble burst on October 24, 1929. The economic foundations were exposed by this terrific collapse as having been utterly rotten for some time, thus literally confirming the attitude of those who had periodically warned the American people to this effect since 1923.

Nothing was more evident than that the chief seeds of this depression were thus sown during the years following 1920, when the policy of economic nationalism in its entirety was fastened upon the country. Not tariffs alone, but all manner of barriers and obstructions and restrictions and reprisals and embargoes and retaliations were made to intervene in order to block every phase of exchange of capital and commerce between civilized countries. Nothing was more patent than that the seeds of the depression were then being planted. This awful panic would have been thereby precipitated a number of years earlier but for our loans abroad of $15,000,000,000, much of which went to pay for our exports; for our gold imports approaching $2,600,000,000 from 1915; for sales of goods on the installment plan aggregating $6,000,000,000; and for the expenditures over a period of years running up from seven to ten billions annually on highway and building construction. Just as soon, Mr. President, as these vast but temporary stimulants materially declined or disappeared, our Nation headed straight to economic disaster.

High-tariff America pleads that the panic originated in high-tariff Europe, while the latter as stoutly contends that it originated in high-tariff America, and for proof cites certain physical facts difficult to get away from. It must be agreed that ours was the outstanding financial and economic force and factor among the nations of the world; that our foundations were either temporary or unsound; that our isolationist leadership had been looked up to by the world and followed since 1920; that the dramatic and tremendous market collapse in New York instantly created the wildest fear and fright in every central bank, every stock market, every exchange and trading place in every civilized country.

There had been a general state of economic recovery and industrial rehabilitation since the war in most parts of the world. Unliquidated phases of the war did not constitute a chief cause of the panic. America's loans abroad of $15,600,000,000 up to 1929 confirmed this fact. Reparations and debts, about which we hear much, regardless of their merits or demerits, were not a major cause of the depression and they are not a major remedy. If the liquid capital of $3,000,000,000 had been kept at home in the various countries of Europe instead of being thrown into the gambling pit in New York, the financial structures of these very countries would not have been weakened to the extent of becoming so susceptible to the effects of the panic outbreak in New York City. Our business and economic leadership, of course, committed a historic blunder in failing early to call in the investment bankers and demand their cooperation to curb these immense speculative forces before they got out of control and ran wild.

Under American leadership this and other countries were not to rest content with the high-tariff tide that arose from 1920 to 1924–25. The chief pretext for this general movement upward had been either retaliation or safeguarding against sporadic imports from countries with depreciated currencies. Most of the nations, including England, in 1925 had gotten back to the gold standard, with the result that general downward tariff revisions with liberalized trade policies were strongly demanded by the rapidly damming up surplus production accompanied by a fall in prices of raw materials in most every part of the world.

America, still in the grip of the forces of trade isolation which were utterly blind to these conditions, became bent on another grand increase of tariffs. This country sowed the wind in 1921–22. We have since seen a veritable whirlwind of tariff increases everywhere, and the end is not yet. Between 1925 and 1929, the second period of wild increases, there were 33 revisions, nearly all increases, between 26 countries of Europe and 17 of Latin America, while Australia, Canada, and New Zealand in 1927 and 1928 made revisions upward, as did Siam, China, and Persia. America, during the political campaign in 1928, instead of furnishing sober leadership and calling a halt in these astonishing excesses that must soon prove disastrous, served notice that early in 1929 she would hasten to add a still higher story to her already sky-high tariff structure.

The result was the notorious Hawley-Smoot Act of June, 1930, which made 890 increases and 235 decreases in a total number of 3,221 dutiable items. The increases, however, related to dutiable imports of $917,000,000, or two-thirds of our total dutiable imports for 1928 of $1,573,000,000. This amount of imports affected, rather than the number of rate changes, is one of the more intelligible tests as to the extent and nature of actual revision. Moreover, the dutiable imports for the calendar year 1931 fell to $695,608,000 and customs receipts to $354,064,472, while the average ad valorem rate on imports, from which 75 per cent of this revenue came, must have exceeded 65 per cent. The ad valorem rate on all dutiable imports averages 50.9 per cent, and it would be far higher but for low rates on such articles as burlap, hides, skins, and a long list of other commodities which we either do not produce or do not produce in sufficient quantity and hence import at a very low rate.

The enactment of our new "Bourbon" tariff law in June, 1930, was followed by still further action in the way of upward revision generally by 25 countries, and, in addition, 18 countries raised their tariffs between August and November, 1931. No human imagination can describe the utterly chaotic and dislocating effects of this veritable network of every kind of obstruction, discrimination, and impediment to the natural movements of capital, goods, and services back and forth between nations. The most hopeless derangement and disorganization of our international financial, credit, exchange, and trade situation has inevitably resulted. How can any person not utterly blinded by provincialism or selfishness fail to recognize the indispensable necessity for practical international cooperation to clarify and liberalize these extreme complications before we can hope for that degree of balanced prosperity here at home that the welfare of the American public actually requires?

Our tariff act of 1930 was merely supplemental to the basic act of 1922. Many of the increases were based on fear alone; others were designed to stop cracks and crevices; still others were to keep out specialties, novelties, and like items indirectly or speculatively competitive. In addition to the agricultural increases, substantial raises were given woolen manufactures, cotton manufactures, sugar, chemicals, earthenware, glass, while still other, but smaller, increases were given silk and rayon, leather, shoes, gloves, cork, matches, and so forth, and so forth. The average Fordney rates for 1928 were 41.57 per cent, contrasted with the present average rate, as I have said, of 50.9 per cent.

The resentment and retaliation against this new, and what was universally considered unjustifiable, tariff boost appeared in every part of the world in the manner just described and for the express and deliberate purpose of blocking and turning back American exports of farm products, automobiles, and scores of other lines. Tennessee, for example, was stopped from shipping tomatoes to Canada by a tariff of $1,200 on a single car. The Italian duty on a Ford car priced at $610 here is considerably over 100 per cent, making the selling price in Italy $1,735. That is a specimen of international trade as practiced by the Bourbon isolationist of this country, and he has a strangle hold on our whole economic situation to-day. When our rates were made unreasonably high against Spanish cork and a few other products, an official decree was promulgated fixing a quota, especially on a wide range of exports from the United States, and its object, as officially explained, was—

> To diminish our purchases in certain countries which punish our products with excessive rigidity and for the purpose of purchasing more from other countries in which we have more obligations.

You will find, Mr. President, that spirit and that policy embedded in the retaliatory decrees of forty-odd nations striking directly at the United States. Similar bitter official comment and drastic action on the part of dozens of nations might be cited.

The automobile industry has thus suffered incalculable losses. If automobile exports could be resumed in the amount of $500,000,000, as they once were, this single phase of trade revival would, to an astonishing extent, restore confidence, credit, and domestic trade activities throughout this country. This view is self-evident when we recall that the automobile industry consumes of their domestic production 15.5 per cent of steel; 53 per cent of malleable iron; 17.4 per cent of aluminum; 14.8 per cent of copper—it would start up the copper industry—26 per cent of lead, 6.5 per cent of zinc, 14.1 per cent of tin, 30 per cent of nickel, 9.3 per cent of cotton, 51.4 per cent of upholstery leather, 18 per cent of lumber, 68.7 per cent of plate glass, 82 per cent of rubber, and 85 per cent of gasoline. The industry furnishes employment, directly and indirectly, for 4,000,000 persons. And yet, Mr. President, here is that vast industry that could infuse instant life into scores of other great industries, and bring most of our 7,000,000 idle laborers back to profitable employment, lying supinely on its back, because, forsooth, a small but powerful group of selfish and blind and dumb isolationists, in an economic sense, have a strangle hold on this Government and on 123,000,000 American people.

England ordinarily exports raw material to the extent only of coal and in the amount of something over $200,000,000, while the United States ordinarily has exports of raw materials of over a billion dollars a year, not including more than $700,000,000 additional of copper and a long line of crude products used by other countries for finished manufacturing purposes. Instead of going resolutely forward and employing all our labor and most of our capital here at home in the manufacture of these raw materials, as England has done for generations, we sit supinely here in the grip of the blind forces of trade seclusion and feed out these vast surpluses of raw materials and semimanufactured materials to all the other civilized and first-class countries of the world, in order that they may utilize their labor and capital in their manufacture while ours remains idle.

Following the war we were far better equipped in most instances than any other country to give employment to our entire capital and labor at home in the manufacture of a greater amount of our raw materials and selling the finished products in all parts of the world. We have, however, suffered the enormous losses incident to inaction and facing in the opposite direction during 10 precious years. Even most of the backward nations have in the meantime made progress in all lines of production, including manufacturing, to our great loss of trade opportunities. Our problem is to bestir ourselves and retrace our steps as rapidly as possible. It has already cost this country more than $25,000,000,000 to teach the economic isolationist in control since 1920 that America is a part of the world in a commercial and economic sense. The tremendous advantage lately gained by this country over Europe is shown by the fact that from 1907 to 1924 English manufacturing production increased 24 per cent, compared with an American increase of 80 per cent. The English output per worker during the same period increased 4 per cent, while the American increased 45 per cent. And yet, Mr. President, we find the forces of isolation rushing to this Capitol and goose-stepping into the halls of legislation demanding still further increases of tariffs against England in the face of those figures.

The honest truth is that except for our foreign trade 30 per cent of our manufacturing plants would close within six months, to say nothing of agriculture and mining.

This country should place itself upon a basis of thorough efficiency. Instead of prescribing trade barriers for every inefficient industry that can be found, for every obsolete plant that can make its way to the Capitol, this country should place itself upon a basis of thorough efficiency for purposes of both domestic and international finance, industry, and commerce. We should then pursue a policy of the lowest production costs, living costs, transportation costs, and distribution costs. As we become economically independent, we should correspondingly throw off artificial restrictions, restraints, and impediments to the most efficient and profitable basis of production and distribution.

In this policy we are confronted at every step by the unfair tactics of the opposition. Sponsors of our present trouble-breeding tariffs in their extremities offer some curious and fantastic defenses. One is that other countries have pushed their tariffs up higher than ours. They ignore the fact that such action was caused by us. This recalls to my mind the incident of the criminal who deliberately provoked a difficulty and later found himself denied the right to invoke the law of self-defense. Another defense is that the late decline of free imports has been greater than that of the dutiable. If this suggestion proves anything, it is the absurdity that the Hawley rates affect free imports more than those dutiable. A third defense is that those who suggest the slightest rate reductions are free-traders. This is remindful of the trick of the burglar who set fire to a house in the suburbs to divert attention while he robbed a business house in the center of the town. Macaulay said that for a pecuniary consideration an entire array of talent could promptly be had that would challenge the law of gravitation.

If the Democratic Party of this creditor and surplus-producing Nation, with the restoration of suitable markets and trade as the basis, can not consistently challenge this major system, it would be ludicrous for it to pretend to oppose minor phases of governmental favoritism.

There is no disguising the fact that powerful influences are at work, either to commit the Democratic Party to high tariffs and trade isolation, or so to chloroform it that in practical effect it will be handicapped in its efforts to fight for the economic policies in which its overwhelming rank and file believe. The two old political parties must not be merged on economic policies—those which have heretofore fundamentally differentiated the Democratic Party from the privilege-ridden element of the Republican Party.

No political party in close and corrupt partnership with the chief beneficiaries of governmental favoritism should be permitted to control and administer the affairs of the Government. Unless Democrats in every section are on their guard, this is precisely what may occur, while the general public will continue to experience periodical panics or unsound business conditions. There is not room in this country for more than one open, avowed, notorious, special-privilege party.

No comment on the effects of high tariffs on agriculture should be necessary in the light of sore experience. During the past 11 years of abnormally high tariffs American agriculture has become fundamentally worse off each year. If the farmer has not yet learned his tariff lesson, I am wondering how many more hundreds of thousands of farm mortgages will have to be foreclosed and how many more millions of the farm population must become impoverished before they realize the truth I am stating.

The farmer as usual has been buckeyed and buncoed by his high-tariff champions. He was given a third revision upward since 1920, embodying a mass of paper rates with no net benefits save as to wool, sugar, some citrus fruits, dairy and truck products, and a few others. His production on 90 per cent of the acreage sown to crops did not get and could not get any net tariff benefits. The principal effect of these high paper rates has been to cause most European and other countries, which had been the chief purchasers of our farm surpluses, to raise their rates against them to prohibitive heights. The exports of agricultural products were $1,035,700,000 prior to the war, $3,452,300,000 in 1920, and $1,693,000,000 in 1929. That includes forestry and everything that can be raked and scraped together under the term "agriculture."

Here is the secret of the awful story of the decline and decay of American agriculture:

Taking 1913 as 100, the price of farm products is 75, manufactures 109, and raw materials 81. A serious dis-location of price levels has occurred. Raw materials in this country have lost 40 per cent of their 1929 values; manufactures, 25 per cent; and agricultural products, 51 per cent. The purchasing power of farm products is hopelessly out of equilibrium with that of either raw materials or manufactures.

American labor has been victimized and misled by high-tariff preachments almost to the extent of agriculture. For one or two generations inexperienced labor was being imported at the rate of near 1,000,000 a year, but objections to our excessive tariffs were drowned out by the loud cry of "protection for American labor." The immigration law and productivity per man are the chief factors in the stabilization of wages in this country. Labor is chronically deceived by the citation of wage scales here and abroad, whereas labor everywhere, as stated, is paid according to the amount of its production. In most United States industries the labor cost is lower than in any country in the world.

In 1925 the value of net production for each dollar paid in wages was $2.50 in the United States and $2.14 in England. Our labor which we paid $1,280 a year was thus cheaper than English labor which was paid only $513 a year. The output per man in the United States is from three to five times as much as that in most of the other countries of the world, depending, as stated, upon the productivity of each wage earner. American labor has been badly misled by the false and hypocritical statement chronically made or implied that most wage earners are in a position to receive tariff benefits. The whole truth is that more than 80 per cent of American factory laborers, more than 85 per cent of farm labor, and 95 per cent of wage earners in the mineral industry derive no net tariff benefits. Virtually all wage increases since 1914 have come out of labor's increased production and not from tariffs.

The average person, and especially the average politician, is too disposed blindly to accept a tariff rate as insuring net rather than mere gross benefits, whereas in most instances the net result is a loss. Of the total of near 28,000,000 wage earners in this country, the 3,000,000, for example, in transportation have no tariff shelter; the nearly 3,000,000 in the building trades; the 3,126,000 clerks, typists, and others not in stores; the 800,000 coal miners; the 2,143,000 professional persons; the 4,242,000 retailers, real-estate agents, insurance agents, etc.; the 800,000 in Federal, State, and local service; 950,000 in the mineral industry; 8,500,000 agricultural workers; 500,000 in motor-vehicle industry; 473,000 in timber and lumber production; 117,000 in newspaper and periodical publishing; and a long list of others receive no net tariff benefits and in most all instances no gross benefits. If labor leaders desire to be fair, they will remind the rank and file that most wage increases in present tariff-protected industries and most all reductions of hours came to American labor prior to 1921, under the liberal and humane policies of the Wilson administration.

If we are to keep all American labor employed at good wages, we must prepare to sell our surplus. The only alternative is to house ourselves off from the world and, barring automatic exchange of some raw materials, proceed to reduce most all other production to our capacity to consume at home. Already we hear suggestions on every hand that this giant Nation should again become as a little child and institute every artificial device possible to restrict output, to valorize, pool, and peg prices. These provincial notions include some recent instructions from Washington to plow up every third row of cotton, to kill 1 cow out of every 10, and similar freakish extremes, to which we are surely headed if we continue, as we have since 1920, to isolate ourselves economically.

For some years many of us have earnestly urged steps that would be calculated to bring about basic readjustments of our tariff and commercial policy and other trade barriers for the paramount purpose of restoring American market and trade opportunities abroad.

The first proposal to this end is for legislation authorizing a permanent world economic conference called by the President, the action of which, more than any other first step, would restore confidence and credit, such conference having for its purposes the development of a spirit of simultaneous tariff revision downward; a liberal commercial policy; mutual agreements eliminating many discriminations in commerce; unshackling international finance, credit; and exchange; and liberalizing the network of reprisals, prohibitions, embargoes, and other restraints which accompany the policy of superprotection;

Second, legislation authorizing the President to negotiate trade agreements based upon mutual tariff concessions and the unconditional most-favored nation doctrine;

Third, that the American Congress, with the legislative bodies of other countries acting as nearly in concert as they will, should, according to their own separate and independent judgments, proceed with all necessary preliminary preparations, with the aid on the part of our Congress of an impartial fact-finding commission, for the careful and gradual readjustment downward of existing excessive tariffs, with a level of moderate rates that will not permit conditions of domestic price monopoly, and a liberal, fair, and friendly commercial policy as the ultimate objectives. This broad policy would, in addition to impregnable home markets, insure wider and better foreign markets for our surplus, healthier domestic industry, and regular employment at suitable wages for all of our labor. I myself would reorganize the present tariff commission, repeal the flexible clause, and adopt a more modified formula for assembling all the facts and factors relating to competitive strength here and elsewhere.

Our national fiscal leadership by those in power during the past 10 years is subject to sharp challenge as to most of its fundamental phases.

It is indispensable that we would keep in mind the fact that the notorious state of unbalanced budgets in every government, on every continent of the world, has greatly weakened the economic structure of the nations. We have here at home a terrific impediment to the restroation of confidence and credit as a preliminary to the restoration of busineses activity, because everywhere we look, at our National Capital, at 48 State capitals, at 3,600 county courthouses, or at tens of thousands of municipal buildings, we find great deficits, which have undermined and seriously impaired the credit of most of these governmental agencies. That is why, in my efforts to discuss some fundamental basis for relief from our panic conditions and to suggest basic remedies, I venture for a moment to call attention to these and kindred phases.

The Hoover administration in 1929 lowered taxes and increased expenditures, when it should have increased taxes and lowered expenditures. The condition of Federal credit and the Federal Treasury as a result is humiliating. Long before this Congress convened and while the Hoover administration was still echoing Henry Ford's slogan that to be prosperous we should spend everything we could get hold of, some of us Democrats were earnestly urging a strict program of retrenchment and economy. Many of us have long protested against a business and fiscal leadership under which peoples and governments, casting all sound fiscal policies to the winds during recent years, have indulged in wild orgies of expenditures, taxes, and debt hopelessly beyond their means. The tragic breakdown of our Federal fiscal policy and management, without precedent in peace time, offers a fair illustration. I dislike to make reference to it; but unless reference is made to it, conditions might be permitted to drag along and become worse.

After all the shouting and boasting about tax reduction and debt reduction since 1921 unsound financing renders it necessary now to make a larger new tax levy in the aggregate than the combined amount of the past three tax reductions, while an amazing and imminent deficit exceeding $3,000,000,000, to be met by borrowing, leaves our public debt credited since 1919 with the equivalent of but a single payment, not from taxes, but from the proceeds of the war surplus assets alone, aggregating $6,379,000,000. In each respect the Government is back where it was after the war.

At this distant period since the war an equilibrium between the income and outgo of the Treasury in competent hands should be easily possible. To this end the Treasury's ancient accounting methods should be revised, and there should be a separate classification and listing of all those expenditures, well recognized and defined as ordinary expenditures, which constitute most of the actual recurring expenses of the Government, and another segregation and classification of extraordinary expenditures, such as those in aid of productive undertakings and the millions of unemployed, the drought sufferers, emergency construction, and other temporary emergency requirements in order that, in the first place, Congress and the general American public may at all times have an intelligent knowledge of the fiscal affairs of the Government; and, secondly, that Congress may develop a tax structure which during an average business year will yield an adequate amount of revenue to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government while at the same time making any special and temporary tax levies to defray all extraordinary expenses of such nature as to be borne by taxes rather than loans. Thus to clarify the revenue situation, by giving notice of which levies are to be permanent and which temporary, would avoid much or most of the usual tax controversy.

Leadership standing for a set of sound fiscal policies pointing back to frugal government in Federal, State, and local affairs is imperative. The fiscal axiom of every agency of government henceforth should be "Economy is better than taxation, and taxation is better than borrowing." We should earnestly invoke the cooperation of Democrats and broad-minded Republicans in charge of State, county, and local governments everywhere in a nation-wide movement to halt and reform existing runaway policies of debt, taxation, and expenditures by substituting official retrenchment, drastic economy, and wise financing. An autstanding tax expert, accountant, and civil engineer, or city manager, engaged by the Federal Government, with similar cooperation by each State, could so standardize, to the extent of recommendations, all Government accounting and building construction, outline a model system of taxation for Federal, State, and local purposes, with such coordination and uniformity as would lighten and make far more equitable the common $10,000,000,000 burden, while their plans for the elimination of waste, extravagance, overlapping governmental agencies and activities would effect enormous savings.

First. Present expenditures—Federal, State, and local—of $12,000,000,000 should, by the most ruthless economies, be reduced, during the next two years, in an aggregate amount running into the billions. Budgetary policy, so often ignored or abused, should be everywhere established—I say this, Mr. President, because there is a limit to which a badly impaired Treasury can go for any purpose, whether it be emergency or otherwise—and rigidly carried out so as to prevent any duplication or overlapping, or waste and extravagance, confining expenditures to absolutely necessary or thoroughly productive purposes. An effective check in particular must be put on municipal expenditures which are running wild. Many appropriations not absolutely indispensable should be suspended.

Second. Federal, State, and local taxes of $10,000,000,000 resting as one common burden on the 123,000,000 American people should, at all hazards, be reformed, made more equitable, and reduced 20 to 35 per cent as speedily as may be legislatively possible. There is vast need and opportunity for uniformity and coordination of Federal, State, and local tax structures, eliminating double taxation, promoting the maximum of equity under the doctrine of ability to pay, removing numberless discriminations, excesses, unscientific rates, and in other vital respects completely reforming our present demoralized, harsh, and chaotic tax situation.

Third. Federal, State, and local indebtedness of $32,000,000,000 was in numerous instances incurred unwisely, unsoundly, and recklessly, with no sinking-fund provisions, subject to excessive interest, with the calamitous result that the credit of most branches and subdivisions of government in America is seriously impaired. The policy of steady payment of the public indebtedness inaugurated by Thomas Jefferson should be maintained. No government can justify chronic borrowing to pay current demands, or tolerate with complacency a gaping deficit until it reaches a rate of near $3,000,000,000 per annum, while sinking-fund policies are in effect suspended.

In this discussion it has been my endeavor to point to and to challenge the narrow and extreme policy of economic nationalism as practiced by the world under American leadership since 1920, and to brand it as easily the chief underlying cause of existing unsound, dislocated, and collapsed industrial, financial, and commercial conditions. I have ventured to urge the adoption of modified and basic economic policies—policies in the interest of every healthy phase of business and agriculture and mining and labor in this Nation—such policies as will, in my judgment, revive confidence and credit, and permanently, not temporarily, cure the present trade paralysis by bringing back both domestic and foreign trade. Deadly surpluses everywhere would then commence to move, the prices of primary commodities would rise, business again would flourish, and full employment to labor and agriculture here at home would return to bless our common country.

Mr. BLACK obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has delivered an address which reflects profound thought. I believe it states sound principles of government and should receive general consideration.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield for that purpose?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Couzens	Kean	Schall
Bailey	Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Keyes	Shipstead
Barbour	Dickinson	King	Smith
Barkley	Dill	La Follette	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on the desk are some nominations of which I think reference should be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair) laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this morning the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs determined to hold a hearing on Thursday on Senate bill 3377, which was recently introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING].

As this bill is not very well known, and there is very little time for it to become known, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.,

CONVENTION TO FRAME CONSTITUTION FOR PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

SECTION 1. The Philippine Legislature is hereby authorized to provide for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention, which shall meet in the hall of the house of representatives in the capital of the Philippine Islands, at such time as the Philippine Legislature may fix, to formulate and draft a constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, subject to the conditions and qualifications prescribed in this act, which shall exercise jurisdiction over all the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 10th day of December, 1898, the boundaries of which are set forth in article 3 of said treaty, together with those islands embraced in the treaty between Spain and the United States concluded at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900. The Philippine Legislature shall provide for the necessary expenses of such convention.

CHARACTER OF CONSTITUTION—MANDATORY PROVISIONS

SEC. 2. The constitution formulated and drafted shall be republican in form, shall contain a bill of rights and provisions to the effect that, pending the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands—

(a) All citizens of the Philippine Islands shall owe allegiance to the United States.

(b) Every officer of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take and subscribe an oath of office, declaring, among other things, that he recognizes and accepts the supreme authority of and will maintain true faith and allegiance to the United States.

(c) Absolute toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant or religious organization shall ever be molested in person or property on account of religious belief or mode of worship.

(d) Property owned by the United States, cemeteries, churches, and parsonages or convents appurtenant thereto, and all lands, buildings, and improvements used exclusively for religious, charitable, or educational purposes shall be exempt from taxation.

(e) Trade relations between the Philippine Islands and the United States shall be upon the basis prescribed in section 6.

(f) The public debt of the Philippine Islands and its subordinate branches shall not exceed limits now or hereafter fixed by the Congress of the United States; and no loans shall be contracted in foreign countries without the approval of the President of the United States.

(g) The debts, liabilities, and obligations of the present Philippine government, its Provinces, municipalities, and instrumentalities, valid and subsisting at the time of the adoption of the constitution, shall be assumed and paid by the new government.

(h) Provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of an adequate system of public schools, primarily conducted in the English language.

(i) Acts affecting currency, coinage, imports, exports, and immigration laws shall not become law until approved by the President of the United States.

(j) Foreign affairs shall be under the direct supervision and control of the United States.

(k) All acts passed by the legislature of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be reported to the Congress of the United States.

(l) The Philippine Islands recognizes the right of the United States to expropriate property for public uses, to maintain military and other reservations and armed forces in the Philippines, and, upon order of the President, to call into the service of such armed forces all military forces organized by the Philippine government.

(m) Appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be as now provided by existing law and shall also include all cases involving the constitution of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

(n) The United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and for the maintenance of the government as provided in their constitution, and for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty and for the discharge of government obligations under and in accordance with the provisions of their constitution.

(o) The authority of the United States commissioner to the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, as provided in this act, shall be recognized.

(p) Citizens and corporations of the United States shall enjoy in the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands all the civil rights of the citizens and corporations, respectively, thereof.

SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTION TO FILIPINO PEOPLE

SEC. 3. If a constitution is formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, the said constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Philippine Islands for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held within four months after the completion of the constitution, on a date to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature, at which election the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands shall have an opportunity to vote directly for or against the proposed constitution, or for or against any proposition separately submitted. Such election shall be held in such manner as may be prescribed by the Philippine Legislature, to which the return of the election shall be made. The Philippine Legislature shall by law provide for the canvassing of the return and, if a majority of the votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution, shall certify the result to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, together with a statement of the votes cast thereon, and upon separate propositions, and a copy of said constitution, propositions, and ordinances.

SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTION TO CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 4. When the constitution has been adopted in compliance with the provisions of this act and has been duly ratified by the people of the Philippine Islands, a certified copy shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for approval. If the Congress by law approves the constitution, or if the Congress, within three months of legislative session following submission to it, fails by law to disapprove the Constitution, the President shall so certify to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of such notification from the President, issue a proclamation for the election of officers of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands provided for in the constitution. The election shall take place not earlier than three months nor later than six months after the proclamation by the Governor General ordering such election. When the election of the officers provided for under the constitution has been held and the results determined, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands shall certify the result of the election to the President of the United States, who shall thereupon issue a proclamation announcing the results of the election, and upon the issuance of such proclamation by the President the existing Philippine government shall terminate and the new government shall enter upon its rights, privileges, powers, and duties, as provided under the constitution. The present government of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the orderly transfer of the functions of government.

If the Congress, within three months of legislative session following submission to it, by law disapproves the constitution adopted and ratified in pursuance of the provisions of this act, then such fact shall forthwith be communicated by the President to the constitutional convention, which shall thereupon consider any objections made and proceed to redraft the constitution for ratification and submission in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. All the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaties mentioned in the first section of this act, except such land or other property as has been designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States, and except such land or other property or rights or interests therein as may have been sold or otherwise disposed of in accordance with law, are hereby granted to the government of the Philippine Commonwealth when constituted.

RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES PENDING COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 6. Trade relations between the United States and the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands established under this act shall be as now existing under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1930: Provided, however, That from the date of the inauguration of the new government provided in this act and thereafter until the final withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries shall be levied, collected, and paid on refined sugars coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands and on raw sugars, in excess of 20 per cent of the total sugar imported into the United States from Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, the Philippine Islands, and from foreign countries, during the previous calendar year. In the event that in any year the limit of free sugar which may be exported to the United States shall be reached by the Philippine Islands the following shall be fixed as the basis for allocating, under export permits issued by the government of the Philippine Commonwealth, sugar produced in the Philippine Islands during the following year. The amount of sugar exported on free entry into the United States shall be allocated to the sugar-producing mills of the islands proportionately on the basis of their outturn the preceding year. The amount of sugar which each mill shall be permitted to export shall be allocated between the mill and the planters on the basis of the proportion of the sugar to be derived from the planters' cane which shall be received by the mill and retained by the planter. The same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries shall be levied, collected, and paid on coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of the amount of coconut oil brought into the United States in the prior calendar year in the form of copra, such coconut oil to be determined on an oil content of copra of 63 per cent; and the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries shall be levied, collected, and paid on all yarns, twines, cords, cordage, rope, and cables, tarred or untarred, wholly or in chief value of manila

(abaca) or other hard fibers, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of a collective total of 7,600,000 pounds of all such articles hereinabove enumerated.

SEC. 7. Until the final and complete withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands—

(1) Every duly adopted amendment to the constitution of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be submitted to the President of the United States for approval. If the President approves the amendment, or if the President fails to disapprove such amendment within six months from the time of its submission, the amendment shall take effect as a part of such constitution.

(2) The President of the United States shall have authority to suspend the taking effect of or the operation of any law, contract, or executive order of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, which in his opinion will result in a failure of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands to fulfill its contracts, or to meet its bonded indebtedness and interest thereon or to provide for its sinking funds, or which seems likely to impair the reserves for the protection of the currency of the Philippine Islands, or may create international complications.

(3) The chief executive of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall make an annual report to the President or Congress of the United States of the proceedings and operations of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall make such other reports as the President or Congress may request.

(4) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a United States commissioner to the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands who shall hold office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is appointed and qualified. He shall be known as the United States high commissioner to the Philippine Islands. He shall be the representative of the President of the United States in the Philippine Islands and shall be recognized as such by the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, by the commanding officers of the military forces of the United States, and by all civil officials of the United States in the Philippine Islands. He shall have access to all records of the government or any subdivision thereof, and shall be furnished by the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands with such information as he shall request.

If the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands fails to pay any of its bonded or other indebtedness or the interest thereon when due or to fulfill any of its contracts, the United States commissioner shall immediately report the facts to the President, who may thereupon direct the commissioner to take over the customs offices and administration of the same, administer the same, and apply such part of the revenue received therefrom as may be necessary for the payment of such overdue indebtedness or for the fulfillment of such contracts. The United States commissioner shall annually, and at such other times as the President may require, render an official report to the President and Congress of the United States. He shall perform such additional duties and functions as may be lawfully delegated to him from time to time by the President.

The first United States high commissioner appointed under this act shall take office upon the inauguration of the new government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands. He shall receive the same compensation and be entitled to such personal staff as is now received and enjoyed by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, but such salary and expenses shall be paid by the United States.

(5) The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the selection of a Resident Commissioner to the United States, and shall fix his term of office. He shall be the representative of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall be entitled to official recognition as such by all departments upon presentation to the President of credentials signed by the chief executive of said islands. He shall have a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, with the right of debate, but without the right of voting. His salary and expenses shall be fixed and paid by the government of the Philippine Islands. Until a Resident Commissioner is selected and qualified under this section, existing law governing the appointment of Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands shall continue in effect.

SEC. 8. From and after the date of the inauguration of the new government provided for in this act, the immigration laws of the United States shall extend and apply to immigrants from the Philippine Islands: Provided, however, That during the existence of said government citizens of the Philippine Islands seeking admission into the United States shall be considered as nonquota immigrants, and the provisions of the immigration laws, regulations, and orders applicable to nonquota immigrants shall apply to them: And provided further, That the number of said immigrants of the Philippine Islands shall not exceed 100 during any calendar year. This section shall not apply to the Territory of Hawaii nor to persons possessing the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, artists, merchants, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years who shall accompany them or subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the accepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation.

SEC. 9. That, except as in this act otherwise provided, the laws now or hereafter in force in the Philippine Islands shall continue in force in the Philippine Commonwealth until altered, amended, or repealed by the Legislature of the Philippine Commonwealth or by the Congress of the United States, and all references in such laws to the Philippines or Philippine Islands shall be deemed to include the Philippine Commonwealth. The government of the Philippine Commonwealth shall be deemed the successor of the government of the Philippine Islands and of all the rights and obligations thereof.

PLEBISCITE ON THE QUESTION OF PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 10. (a) At any time within the fifth year after the inauguration of the government provided for in this act the people of the Philippine Islands shall vote on the question of Philippine independence. The Legislature of the Philippine Commonwealth shall provide for the time and manner of an election for such purpose, at which the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands shall be entitled to vote.

(b) If a majority of the votes cast are in favor of Philippine independence, the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall so report to the President of the United States, who shall within 60 days after the receipt of such report, issue a proclamation announcing the results of such election, and within a period of two years of such report the President of the United States shall withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty then existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippine Islands, and on behalf of the United States shall recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as a separate and self-governing nation and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the government instituted by the people thereof, under the constitution then in force: Provided, That the constitution has been previously amended to include the following provisions:

(1) That the property rights of the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be promptly adjusted and settled, and that all existing property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States shall be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded to the same extent as property rights of citizens of the Philippine Islands.

(2) That the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States not later than two years after his proclamation recognizing the independence of the Philippine Islands.

(3) That the officials elected and serving under the constitution adopted pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be constitutional officers of the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands and qualified to function in all respects as if elected directly under such government, and shall serve their full terms of office as prescribed in the constitution.

(4) That the debts and liabilities of the Philippine Islands, its provinces, cities, municipalities, and instrumentalities, which shall be valid and subsisting at the time of the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States, shall be assumed by the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands; and that where bonds have been issued under authority of an act of Congress of the United States by the Philippine Islands, or any Province, city, or municipality therein, the Philippine government will make adequate provision for the necessary funds for the payment of interest and principal, and such obligations shall be a first lien on the taxes collected in the Philippine Islands.

(5) That the government of the Philippine Islands, on becoming independent of the United States, will assume all continuing obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain ceding said Philippine Islands to the United States.

(6) That by way of further assurance the government of the Philippine Islands will embody the foregoing provisions (except paragraph (3)) in a treaty with the United States.

(c) If a majority of the votes cast are against Philippine independence, the chief executive of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall so report to the Congress of the United States for their action regarding the future political status of the Philippine Islands.

NOTIFICATION TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

SEC. 11. Upon the proclamation and recognition of the independence of the Philippine Islands under their constitution, the President shall notify the governments with which the United States is in diplomatic correspondence thereof and invite said governments to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands.

TARIFF DUTIES AFTER INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 12. After the Philippine Islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries.

CERTAIN STATUTES CONTINUED IN FORCE

SEC. 13. All laws or parts of laws applicable to the Philippine Islands not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby continued in force and effect until altered, amended, or repealed in accordance with existing law by the Philippine Legislature or by the legislative authority of the government established under the provisions of this act, or by act of Congress of the United States.

FILIPINO PARTICIPATION IN WORLD WAR

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs a letter written by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] to the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives. This letter contains valuable information relative to the contributions made by the Philippine people during the World War.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1932.

Hon. BUTLER B. HARE,
Chairman Committee on Insular Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs held extensive hearings in the matter of Philippine independence in 1930 and probably will limit its hearings in this session to statements of the official commission from the Philippines and such department heads as desire to express opinions.

I have followed as far as possible the well-conducted, thorough manner in which the House is considering this subject.

There is one phase which I consider of importance and which has not been presented before your committee.

I hope this communication may be read to your committee and made part of the printed hearing.

I am sure you will agree that a very great stimulus will be given to the people of the Philippines to push forward into new fields for greater opportunity and expansion in agriculture, manufacture, and trade, but this stimulus can not come until a definite date for independence is set, and I fear that if this is refused the present uncertainty, economic stagnation, standing still, and lack of advancement will continue.

The Filipinos are all desirous of independence; have been temperate and kindly in their requests for it. Their petitions have never been accompanied by bombast or threats.

The special subject that I desire to present to your committee is their record during the World War, which should give us confidence in their ability to maintain order and administer a stable government. What happened in the Philippines at that time should be known to all Americans.

Our participation in the World War naturally gave new hope to their independence movement. Our declaration in favor of self-determination by nations was taken as an indorsement of the aspiration for self-determination for the Philippines in the matter of independence.

Their conduct then was as fine as that displayed in the States of our Union, and we should not fail to remember and appreciate it.

There was no hostility in the minds of the Filipinos against the Germans. A number of German merchants and residents in the Philippines were very popular with them, so their offer of assistance to the general object of the war, which had been described to be the preservation of the small nations and the self-determination of all.

But it also gave them an opportunity to demonstrate in a very practical way, both financially and with the offer of their young men for active war service, their loyalty to the United States and to the American flag.

We declared war in April, 1917. On May 5 of the same year a monster demonstration was held in Manila. Fifteen thousand Filipinos gathered in front of the Governor General's residence; speeches were made pledging them to any sacrifice for the benefit of the United States.

A special session of the legislature was summoned, and it quickly passed the following resolution: "We firmly believe that the final triumph of democracy, in securing for the world the principle of nationality for the benefit of the small nations, will finally enable our people to attain the ideals for which we have always struggled, namely, our constitution into a free and independent nation, with a democratic government of law and order, ready to be another instrument of democracy and universal progress."

To this President Wilson replied: "Please convey to the Philippine Legislature, in warmest terms, my appreciation of its admirable resolutions."

This was later followed by the passage of Joint Resolution No. 7: "That the Governor General be, and hereby is, authorized to take all necessary steps for the earliest possible construction, under the direction of the Government of the United States and at the expense of the treasury of the Philippine Islands, of a modern submarine and a modern destroyer, which shall, as soon as available, be offered to the President of the United States, for service in Philippine waters or elsewhere, as said President may require or authorize."

This act was approved by the President and finally resulted in the building of a fine, new-type destroyer called the Rizal. It was officered by Americans and manned by Filipinos.

Everyone thought at the time we were entering upon a long war, but, getting into the service late, as it happened, it was transferred to the United States Navy and used in other waters, so the Filipinos were not called upon to pay for it.

Finally, what is called the Quezon Militia Act, No. 2715, was passed, giving the Governor General the power to enforce compulsory military service in the islands. It provided for the inclusion in the Philippine National Guard of every able-bodied citizen between the ages of 18 and 45. It created a military commission as advisors to the Governor General. This was followed by a proclamation of the Governor General in 1917, and legislation in the United States was urged which would permit our President to accept the service of this division for foreign service.

All through the provinces the best of the Filipino youths volunteered. Suspicion of the ultimate attitude of the United States regarding independence had disappeared. Here we find them volunteering for duty abroad. Twenty-eight thousand volunteered when only 14,000 were authorized by Washington. The United States spent only $515,000 for their equipment and this preparation. The Filipinos, out of their treasury, expended $2,406,000.

All American troops and the American Navy was withdrawn from the Philippines during the period of the war. The whole government, its policing, and its army was left to the good judgment and loyalty of the Filipino people.

Mr. Wilson expressed the opinion that "It may have a wholesome effect, even in Europe, to have Filipinos there fighting for the cause of democracy."

All agitation for independence ceased. With a fine spirit they did not seize upon this opportunity to press their claims for independence. It is the only period in their history in connection with our own in which they have not on every occasion pressed a consideration of their national aspirations.

They organized a corps of 4-minute speakers. They subscribed to the Liberty loan the sum of ₱23,247,000, more than double their allotment, and it is significant that of this sum ₱9,000,000 came from the Provinces, and 95 per cent of those who subscribed were native Filipinos.

In addition to their subscription to the Liberty loans they added another ₱10,000,000 for the American Red Cross Society.

For a poor people who, according to the Manila American, does not even understand what liberty means, and the responsibility of self-government, this was a demonstration of offers of men and money in time of distress, and was an answer of loyalty and capacity that should be conclusive.

Another significant happening was the fact that while all American soldiers were withdrawn, none but Filipino soldiers and constabulary were left, there was no trouble in the Moro country. It was unusually peaceful during this period. It substantiates the theory of the Filipino that he can get along better with the Moros, who are Malays, and settle possible disputes quicker than can an American who belongs to an alien race.

It is reported that 4,785 Filipinos actually served in the United States Army, enlisting in the United States. Fifty-six were killed. The Navy, which had formerly employed many Asiatics, replaced them by Filipinos, so that in the year 1926 we find there were 4,240 Filipinos in the United States naval service.

It was freely predicted that we would have a long war of at least three years. This was the thought of everyone. If we had such confidence in the Filipino people, and in their loyalty to move our troops and Navy out of the islands during the war, what justification remains for the continued presence of the Army at great cost during times of peace?

The thought of retaining the island people against their will and over their objection and despite their protest, by threat of force, should be repugnant, abhorrent, to the decent feelings of any civilized man, especially to the right-thinking, fundamental American.

Thanking you for this courtesy, I am,
Yours cordially,

HARRY B. HAWES.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, several days ago I gave notice that an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the bill (S. 3045) relating to Federal assistance in times of distress would be offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], and myself.

Permit me to say at the outset that in large part I agree with the conclusions which have been reached by Senators COSTIGAN and LA FOLLETTE, who have offered this measure. As I stated several days ago on the floor of the Senate, it is my opinion that they have performed an excellent public service in the investigation which was conducted by the Committee on Manufactures and in presenting to this body a bill which embodies their ideas of the proper method of reaching a partial solution.

The substitute which has been offered is in line with part of the conclusion reached by those Senators. The substitute recognizes that there exists to-day throughout the length and breadth of this country an unparalleled economic disturbance. It recognizes that on account of this situation the assistance of the Federal Government is needed in so far as it can, consistently with sound governmental principles, aid in the relief of the widespread distress throughout the Nation. In many respects the substitute is similar to the Costigan-La Follette measure. In some respects it is based upon fundamentally different conceptions of government; a conception of differences which existed long before they were brought to the front in this country by Jefferson and Hamilton.

As I conceive it, the measure offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] is Hamiltonian to the extent that it is based upon the evident belief that there is more good judgment, that there is more ability, in the concentrated governmental bureaus in Washington than we find on the part of the people in their parishes, their counties, their townships, their municipalities, and their States.

Jefferson believed that the people could be trusted. Hamilton said, "The people, your people, are beasts." Every word spoken by that great exponent of Democracy, Thomas Jefferson, tended toward the point of not subtracting from the rights of the people but giving to them the maximum liberty that could be given consistent with orderly government. Mr. Jefferson went to the extent—and in that, as in practically everything else he said, I agree with him—that he was opposed to the establishment of courts of chancery with the power to try cases without juries by reason of the fact that he believed that the people could be trusted. Mr. Hamilton believed that the people could not be trusted. It was, therefore, very natural that Mr. Hamilton favored a strong central Government in Washington, and that Mr. Jefferson believed that the greatest happiness for the people could be obtained and their interests could best be subserved by leaving to them the maximum amount of liberty of action in governmental affairs consistent with good government. The statement was even made that he believed the New England townships exemplified the wisest governmental principle that had ever been devised for the control of the affairs of men.

To-day, as in the times of Jefferson and Hamilton, there are two conflicting schools of political thought. There is one, as manifested in the letter which each Senator received this morning from the steering committee of the Social Workers Conference on Federal Action on Unemployment, which represents the Hamiltonian viewpoint. It takes the position that there is danger in intrusting the administration of affairs where money is concerned to the people in the States and the counties and the municipalities, and that the only way to guarantee a proper administration of local affairs is by the establishment of a huge towering bureau in Washington, vested with the powers that I shall show to this body are more extensive and more far-reaching than have been proposed since the foundation of this Government. This letter says:

> This substitute does not contain the safeguards necessary to prevent unwise administration of relief, to prevent a tremendous waste of Federal public funds.
> Note—
> This substitute does not contain the safeguards necessary to prevent unwise administration.

Why not? They are honest in their opinion that it does not offer the proper safeguards because they evidently believe, being sincere and devout apostles of the Hamiltonian theory, that bureaus are vested with infinite wisdom and infallibility, while the people, as stated by Mr. Hamilton, can not be trusted.

Why do I say that? Because the substitute, which provides twice as much relief for the unemployed of America as does the original bill, leaves the administration directly to the people themselves in the various States. These gentlemen say that that means waste and unwise administration. If it be true that the people can not be trusted, if it be true that they must have a towering bureau in Washington to direct the churches, the community chests, and their local charitable organizations that they shall employ to administer charity and the plans which shall be conceived, then their statement is correct. The substitute is based upon the theory that the people can be trusted to administer their own affairs; particularly do its framers believe that to be true in connection with the administration of public charity to relieve want and distress.

The statement has been made that those who oppose the original bill must be opposed to Federal aid. No; that is not correct. We do not oppose Federal aid, but we do oppose such Federal control as is suggested by the Senators from Colorado and Wisconsin.

Mr. President, there is no other measure which has ever come before this body which touches more delicately the home, the boys, the girls, and the men and women of America; it touches them in the most sensitive spot. When they are in want and desperation, when the gaunt figure of hunger enters their homes, these gentlemen of the Social Workers' Conference on Federal Action, apostles of the Hamiltonian theory, tell us that we must permit them to be administered to by experts selected in the far-off city of Washington, with their coolness, and their calmness, and I must add frequently with their callousness to human suffering. Personally I prefer to trust the administration of affairs touching human need and human want to the kindly and generous sentiments of those who live close by where want has made its habitation and where hunger emaciates the frame and weakens the blood.

If it be liberalism to favor centering more power in the Government bureaus of Washington, then I confess I trust that the party to which I pledge allegiance may never adopt any such form of liberalism. It is based upon the Hamiltonian theory that the people can not be trusted.

Remembering that both bills provide $375,000,000 for the alleviation of human suffering, with the exact language adopted in each bill, that both bills provide for $125,000,000 to be used between now and July 1, and that the substitute measure, in addition, provides for $375,000,000 more for road building to be unmatched, I desire first to call attention to the real substance and effect of the bill originally offered. I do that because some have seemed to believe that the differences are merely technical. The differences are as fundamental as government itself.

What difference does it make to whom you give too much power? Too much power is dangerous, whether it be vested in a government or a group of specially privileged plutocrats, in a religious group, or in any other group. The real liberal, who has come down through the ages holding aloft the torch of human liberty, has not stood for concentration of power in a centralized government or in the hands of any particular group.

In order that the Senate may see the background, I call attention first to the provisions of the original bill. It provides, first, a board consisting of the Chief of the Children's Bureau. I might state that it would be interesting to those who will study this bill to see the tremendous power which is given to this one individual in this measure. It goes far beyond the power that is given any other head of a bureau in Washington. I shall have occasion to refer to that as I proceed. The other members are the director of the extension work in the Department of Agriculture, the chief of the vocational rehabilitation service, and two members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

There is the beginning of a new bureau; and remember that bureaus seem to be the only thing in all history that have discovered the secret of immortality. They never die; they become more greedy with each passing year—greedy for power, greedy for money, greedy for enlarged personnel.

The two appointive members shall receive $25 daily, and all members of the board shall receive traveling expenses or per diem allowances. An unlimited number of committees may be appointed by the board, with no salary but with traveling expenses or per diem in lieu thereof, as prescribed for civilian employees of the executive branch of the Government. I am giving the background of the new bureau, as outlined in the Costigan-La Follette measure.

The Chief of the Children's Bureau, with the approval of the board, may spend what may be necessary for personal services, rent in Washington and elsewhere, and for printing and binding. Why has it become necessary, if the last words of the bill do not simply contain a "promise to the ear," to permit the Chief of the Children's Bureau or the bureau to have money to establish offices throughout this country with reference to the administration of relief to the suffering and for human need?

The Chief of the Children's Bureau may, with the approval of the board, appoint and fix the compensation of experts and may appoint other employees under the rules of the civil service as to appointment and compensation. The background is being laid.

The administrative expenses of the Federal agencies are made a first charge against 60 per cent of the funds. It will be found in lines 14 and 15, page 5, that the first provision, in so far as 60 per cent of the funds is concerned, is that administrative expenses shall come first. Of course, that is wholly in line with the bureaucratic rule. The amount of $350,000 can be set aside for administrative purposes under subdivision (d), page 6.

If it is desired to limit the expenditures to this amount, it will be necessary for this provision to have clarification, because later on, in lines 12 and 13, page 9, the bill states that the estimate of $350,000 "shall be subject to subsequent review and revision by the board."

Under this bill as it is written—whether the authors intended it or not I can not say—there is no limitation on the amount that could be used for administrative expenses.

We start out with a proposal to relieve charity throughout the country. We are not proposing to relieve unemployment in Washington, as I understand, in this bill, except in so far as that might come within its general purview. There is no place in all this broad land where there are more public buildings being erected. It is my understanding that only recently there was a palatial public building completed and occupied in this city; and I have been told by a Senator on this floor that it has a private elevator for the head of that department, and a guard at a large door to protect that elevator from becoming contaminated by the use of other individuals. I refer to the new Department of Commerce Building. And yet we start out with at least $350,000 of a fund which is supposed to be used for the relief of human suffering to be utilized by a bureau in Washington on the theory that bureaus are infallible and that the people can not be trusted!

Now, let us see how relief will be administered after this great new bureau, with its tentacles projecting into every section of the United States, has been built up.

A certain amount of this $375,000,000 will be administered through State agencies, hampered, limited, and controlled by the Federal bureau, as I shall hereafter show the Senate. An unlimited amount is authorized to be expended within the State, by such means as the Federal bureau at Washington determines, for migratory workers and their families. In other words, this bureau, in addition to having the power of life and death over the poor, hungry, and starving people in every part of this Nation, with the power to give funds or to withdraw them as it sees fit, is likewise given in this bill the power to spend an unlimited amount throughout this Nation for migratory workers, whether these contributions clash with public donations of the local community or not.

In addition to that fact, it is provided on lines 9 to 12 of page 11 of the bill that this bureau can absolutely decline to give a single penny to a single State of this Union unless the State agrees in advance to such plans as may be prescribed for taking care of the migratory workers who might be found in that State. Power! Hamiltonism! No province of Rome in the days of its greatest glory was ever made any more subject to the imperial purple in that city than the States of this Republic will be subject to bureaucratic control if this bill should become a law in its present form.

Now I desire to assert certain things that this bill carries out, and I shall establish them by referring to the paragraphs in the bill.

Whether any amount is apportioned or allocated to a single State depends entirely upon the Federal board in Washington. I shall show that by the provisions of the bill itself.

This board is unquestionably vested with the tremendous power of allocating 80 per cent of $375,000,000, or $300,000,000, to any State it sees fit, and probably 100 per cent. I shall hereafter show that the board in Washington has the power to select a swarm of Federal agents and snoopers to investigate the public and private charities of the State; has the power to veto the appointment of all State agents for charitable purposes; has the power to withhold charitable funds if it dislikes the plans adopted by States, counties, or municipalities; has the power to withhold the funds if the Federal bureau in Washington, acting through the Chief of the Children's Bureau, does not like the personnel selected by the States, counties, and municipalities to administer charitable funds; that it can actually withhold funds from the State if it does not like the plans or agents adopted by private institutions, such as community chests, churches, fraternal organizations, or other institutions selected by States to aid in feeding the hungry and ministering to the wants of the needy.

We are charged with being "technical" in opposing this bill. Is it technical to raise an objection to a measure which is going to permit a few people in Washington to determine to what types of people and under what plans relief shall be administered to the suffering and stricken in the far-off State of California, in the great Middle West city of Chicago, in the city of Atlanta, Ga., or in the States of Wisconsin or Colorado?

It may be, Mr. President, that there are those who for Federal aid are willing to pay the tremendous price of permitting the last vestige of State control over the home to be turned over to a bureau in Washington, but I do not believe it.

We thus have the issue squarely presented between local administration at home, as sponsored by Mr. Jefferson, and bureaucratic control in Washington, as sponsored by Mr. Hamilton.

Now let us see whether or not these statements are justifiable.

Forty per cent of $375,000,000, or $150,000,000, may be apportioned in proportion to population if such amount is not in excess of two-thirds of the amounts appropriated or used by public and private agencies, to be expended as provided in section 12 and subject to determination by the board in Washington.

In the beginning there is a 40 per cent stipulation. That will be found on lines 1 to 13, page 5, and lines 9 to 10, page 12. This may be apportioned, but it must be matched at least partially by the States.

There is no such provision in the substance. I had a letter a few days ago from the State of Alabama saying:

> If any relief is proposed to this State, do not put in the impossible stipulation that it must be matched by a State that has a $19,000,000 deficit.

Now, this may be apportioned. Note: Not "must be." In other words, if the State of Arizona desires to get 40 per cent of that fund in the beginning, it must first satisfy the board, and subsequently the Chief of the Children's Bureau must be assured, that the State of Arizona will administer relief with the agents accepted by the board and in accordance with the plans the board demands.

If there is any question about that, I have already referred to the sections and the lines in which that occurs.

Now, just one further statement, to which I shall refer later.

If the board decides that the State of Arizona should not have this 40 per cent, what is the remedy of the State of Arizona? The State of Arizona will have none. The decision of the board in two places in the bill is declared to be final. When the State of Arizona, through its governor or its agents, appears with its hat in its hand before an administrative bureau in Washington in order to obtain relief, the decision of the bureau is final.

No, Mr. President, the price of relief is too great if it must be obtained at the loss of every vestige of self-respect of the sovereign States of this Nation as they appear, hat in hand, before an inferior bureau of the United States of America.

Now let us see what goes with the remaining 60 per cent, or $225,000,000.

First, it is to be applied to meet the administrative expenses of the Federal agencies under the act. Assuming that it was the intention of the authors to limit these administrative expenses to $350,000, we know from experience that the $350,000 will never feed a single hungry stomach in a single State of the American Union. Bureaus do not return funds to the Federal Treasury; so there we start out with the first $350,000 of the 60 per cent.

The reserve fund of the $225,000,000 after the 40 per cent has been allocated on a population basis, provided the States have met the requirements of the Federal bureau, can be allocated to those States where the bureau believes the greatest need exists; and there has been some complaint that this bill provides that the governor shall make certain statements. I have even heard it criticized on the floor because it is not right to have the governors make statements. But they must not make their statements in this bill to the Secretary of the Treasury, who stands with the dignity of a Cabinet officer. They must satisfy this bureau that the State has made reasonable efforts within its resources to provide for emergency relief expenditures.

So here is your picture; and remember that after the board acts, another section of the bill provides that the Chief of the Children's Bureau must insure in advance that the State has complied with the plans. So you find the State coming to this bureau. We have all had experiences with bureaus. We know that they frequently become inflated. We know that they are frequently a little difficult of access to the average citizen. So here comes the State of California, we will say, and its representatives must prove what? That they have administered or will administer charity according to plans this bureau approves; that they will use only agents that the bureau approves, and that they have used every reasonable effort to obtain emergency relief in their State.

If it be wrong for the governor of a sovereign State to be required to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that there is a great emergency, how much more is it wrong to have the same authority compelled to stand with hat in hand before a Federal bureau and make a certificate to the same effect!

I call attention to this fact that under lines 9 and 10, and lines 18 and 19, page 3, the decision of the board is final. There is no chance of escape from that conclusion, because it appears in two separate places. Therefore, there is a proposal which appropriates $375,000,000 to be apportioned to States if they can meet the requirements of the bureau, to be apportioned to States if they will agree to administer charity as the bureau provides, to be apportioned to the States if they will appoint only such agents within the State, to be paid by the State, in accordance with plans and specifications of an inferior Federal bureau in Washington. If the States have sunk into any such low and debased attitude as that, then we have gone far afield from the original conception of this Government.

I call attention to what happened in a case where bureaus were given such authority in the year 1874. I read from that magnificent book, The Tragic Era, written by Mr. Claude G. Bowers. It so happens that the reference made is to the State in which I live, but the principle is universal and nation-wide. Said Mr. Bowers:

> Yet there were outrages in Alabama on the other side. Taking advantage of the spring flood of the Alabama, Warrior, and Tombigbee Rivers, which had inundated a large section of the country, causing distress among the negroes, Congress had been asked for an appropriation for relief. Eighty thousand dollars was thus available for the purchase of bacon to be distributed under the supervision of the Republican politicians of the State. The flood was in the spring, the bacon money was soon available, but there had been no distribution, and the Democrats in Congress called for a report. An investigation showed that the bacon was being used not so much in the flooded sections as in communities where it would do the most good politically. The Army captain sent to investigate seized 5,348 pounds sent to dry territory 80 miles distant from the nearest flooded section and 17,430 pounds in other communities untouched by the flood. Even so, there was enough left for bacon suppers in negro churches for all who pledged themselves to vote the Republican ticket. But the scandal broke, the supply was exhausted, and there was weeping and gnashing of teeth among hundreds of whites and blacks who had failed to get their quota.

To those who desire to pursue this subject further and obtain a more detailed narrative of the method of administration by the Federal bureau of the bacon in 1874 I refer them to the book known as Reconstruction in Alabama, written by Mr. Walter L. Fleming.

For those who believe in a strongly centralized Government in Washington, it is perfectly appropriate to support the La Follette-Costigan bill with its provisions. If, however, they can find in any period of the history of the world where such a position has been construed as a philosophy of liberality and an attitude of standing for the rights of the people instead of the plutocratic few, I challenge them to produce the proof.

I believe in a government by the people of this country. I do not believe in a government by bureaus, of bureaus, and for bureaus. I believe in a government of the people, for the people, and by the people of this Nation. The absolutely necessary bureaus should be subservient to the people.

Mr. President, let us go further. Even the amount of 40 per cent of the $140,000,000 apportionment is not absolute. By that I mean that the board is not compelled to allot any single dollar to any particular State. I assert that under this bill, if for some technical reason, for some whim, for some caprice, or for some fancy, the board in Washington concluded that any State of this Union should not have a dollar of these funds, that State would be helpless, and its hands would be tied. The wail of the distressed, the cry of the weak, the longing of the hungry would not be heeded in Washington.

Why do I say that? If not used during 1932, one-half of this $140,000,000, it is provided, may be taken away from these States by the board and given to other States. That leaves $70,000,000 which, if any part of it could be allocated to the States as a matter of right, they would receive. I refer those who may question that to lines 20 to 24, page 5, and lines 1 to 9, page 6.

Bear in mind, further, that even if a suppliant State runs the gantlet and gets by the complete board, the Chief of the Children's Bureau, the all-powerful official in this body, being charged with administrative relief, still is compelled to insure that the State either has or will comply with every mandate of the board.

I desire to call attention further to the fact that if the suppliant State gets by the Chief of the Children's Bureau, manages to get by the board, and a certificate is issued to the Secretary of the Treasury stating that a humble State has appeared with hat in hand and is now, according to the supreme edict, entitled to obtain relief for its starving multitudes, still if the Chief of the Children's Bureau finds thereafter that the State has failed in some of its duties, the certificate may be canceled and the fund withheld. To those who may question that, I refer them to page 10, lines 3 and 4.

Now, let us see what would happen to the State. They have no appeal. The measure specifically says that they shall have no appeal. The board's action is the last word with reference to those States. If there is any question about that, I invite attention to section 11, page 11.

Let us see what the State has to do when it comes as a humble suppliant before this almighty power which sits in Washington, this infallible commission which knows exactly how charity ought to be administered in California, in New York, in Illinois, even though the people there do not know; this infallible commission, which knows exactly the kind of agents whom we ought to employ down in Alabama, though the people may not be capable of choosing. Let us see.

I invite the attention of those who care to read the act to lines 13 to 16, page 7, where it will be found that the act is to be administered under rules and regulations adopted by State authorities, but approved by the board; that it must be under the guidance of the Washington bureau. See lines 1 and 2, page 4.

The chief must insure compliance by the States with the chief's rules. Line 18, page 3.

"Technical," do I hear? It may be that there are some in this country who have reached the conclusion that they are ready wholly to obliterate State lines. That point has been reached by people in other countries. They reached the point where it was thought that none but the select in the imperial city could determine the rules for the subject peoples in the provinces, and it was only a very short time before some there were in control who declined to continue to throw the crumbs of bread that fell from the table of the rich in an effort to bribe the sovereign voters of the imperial city.

The State must submit plans to the chief of the bureau, and they shall be subject to the approval of the board. Lines 17 to 22, page 7.

The board can require statements of all available funds in the State for charity, both public and private. It is important to remember that, because I expect to show later by the very terms of the bill itself that if my State or any other State should see fit to utilize some of the existing agencies, like the churches, the community chests, the fraternal organizations, and the agents of such institutions were not satisfactory to the chief of the children's bureau, or if the plan by which a church, for instance, administering relief to the starving and the hungry, was not satisfactory to the chief of the children's bureau, every dollar of Federal funds could be withdrawn.

The board can require a statement of all available funds in the State for charity, both public and private. A State must provide for adequate State administrative personnel. We are not talking now about the agents of the Federal bureau; we have passed that stage. The bureau has been set up. The sum of $350,000 that is supposed to be utilized for feeding the hungry has gone to feed those in Washington who are hungry for jobs as they tramp around through America and probe into the private administration of State, city, county, and municipal community chests.

The State must provide for adequate State administration personnel. However, that is at State expense. The State must employ its personnel at State expense.

The qualifications of State agents must meet the approval of the board, and because it says in another place they must be insured by the Chief of the Children's Bureau, they must also run the gantlet of the chief.

Here we have the chief of the bureau with power to spend $350,000 at least in the employment of Federal agencies, and then that chief, sitting here all powerful in Washington, knowing so much more about local conditions in the State of South Dakota, local conditions away out in New Mexico and away down in Georgia, can say, "We do not like the agents you have selected to administer charity in your State." I confess that if there be those who believe in a strongly centralized Government in Washington, who believe that the sole safety of the Republic or the manifest destiny of the democracy is represented by an oligarchy in some central city, then these proposals are all right. I invite those who favor them to say so, but I ask them to put it on the proper ground. Do not hide behind the idea of "liberality of thought."

Not content with these provisions, lines 8 and 9, page 8, provide that the specification of plans for local administration of funds for those in need must be satisfactory to the board. I have always had an idea that this was the one last thing that would be left to the people. I had always thought that the tender hand placed upon the fevered brow by a loving neighbor would be worth more than the smooth and studied sympathy of an expert. Evidently in that conclusion we are wrong. In order for those who are sick and hungry and distressed to receive proper ministrations, it is necessary to have the person who is to put the hand upon the fevered brow selected by the Chief of the Children's Bureau in the city of Washington.

A further provision on page 8 is that the State must take care of nonresidents. Remember that there is a provision in another place which gives the bureau the absolute right to spend every dollar of the $375,000,000, if it wants to, for the care of those particular individuals. When we think about the "bacon" that was used down in Alabama, with $90,000, it sinks into potential insignificance in comparison with the $375,000,000 which is so "liberally" proposed by the bill in its present form.

The representation of the State that it has complied with the provisions of the law might ordinarily be accepted. One would suppose that it would be sufficient if the governor of a State, or an organization selected by the governor, should come to Washington to this all powerful board and say "We have complied with your requirements; we have surrendered our right to determine who shall minister to our sick and hungry; we have surrendered our right to determine the plans under which it shall be done." But it seems that it would not. It then becomes the duty of the Chief of the Children's Bureau, after the State has come here and solemnly said "We have complied with every one of your impossible conditions," to ascertain and verify the facts presented by the State.

In this day of centralization, in this day of infallibility of bureaus, why should they accept the word of the officials of a sovereign State that they have performed their duty? No; the Hamiltonian theory is that the people are "beasts," that they are not able to take care of their own affairs in their own townships, in their own counties, in their own municipalities, and in their own States. They must have this all-wise and all-powerful board in Washington so that whenever they make a statement the snoopers may go out at Government expense and investigate in the State in order to determine if the State officials have told the truth.

The words which specify the duty of the Chief of the Children's Bureau with reference to what State officials have said are that the Chief of the Children's Bureau shall—

> Verify the statements and confirm the plans submitted by the State agency.

The States have sunk so low, if this conception of Government is correct, that they are not even to be given credit for being honorable or composed of an honorable citizenship. If the board, after the statements have been verified by the Chief of the Children's Bureau, think the plans adequate and appropriate, they shall then be approved by this board in Washington and the State agency shall be notified that "Upon investigation we find, much to our surprise, that you told the truth, that you have complied with the provisions. Therefore, you may or may not have the benefaction according to the opinion which we have to-day or to-morrow."

Here is one excellent provision that should always be made whenever a new bureau is created or whenever we have to depend upon a bureau for action. It recognizes that they could not act immediately. While statements have been made concerning the care of the hungry immediately and it is said it can not be done without ready funds which may be provided in about 10 days or thereabout, what does this bill provide? It provides that "within 60 days after the appropriation" and after the State has appointed an agency and submitted plans to the Chief of the Children's Bureau and appointed a personnel satisfactory to the bureau and the board, then the Chief of the Children's Bureau can certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, "all is well, and I desire that this money shall go to this distant State."

While this is going through the red tape of the bureau people are starving to death. Talk to me about speed and celerity where a bureau is concerned! I have right now a proposition pending with one of the bureaus, where the Government of the United States, several years ago, took a man's land without cause or excuse. They admit that they took it without excuse. They admit that the land belongs to him. He can not bring suit against the Government. The land is worth $200, a small amount to the Government, but a large amount to him. I have been informed that the only possible remedy for that man is to go through the red tape of introducing a bill and having it drag its weary way through both Houses of Congress, at a cost of several hundred dollars, in order that the Bureau of Efficiency with its infallibility may be proved 100 per cent perfect.

Of course it will take 60 days to get such a certificate from the Children's Bureau. It probably would require more than 60 days.

After the 60 days and after the certificate is made to the Secretary of the Treasury, has the State yet obtained its money? That certificate is still liable to revocation. "Such certificate, unless revoked as provided in section 11," authorizes payments to the States. It is very interesting to see what section 11 is, because therein hangs a story. The board can revoke the certificate at any time before or after payment to the State. (P. 10, line 3; par. 11, p. 11; sec. 2 on apportionment). Note this: If the certificate has been granted and then through the activities of the Chief of the Children's Bureau and the agents of the Chief of the Children's Bureau it is found that the State does not have personnel satisfactory to the chief, or if the plans are not satisfactory, or if they believe nonresidents will not be cared for, or whenever, for any reason in their supposed superior wisdom, the States have not "properly expended or properly supervised the expenditures of funds in the State," the certificates can be revoked.

What does that mean? Supervision means "superintendence of." It means "control of." That means that the bureau through this legislation imposes on the State the responsibility and duty of investigating the personnel, the method of expenditure, and the plans adopted by every agency in that State which dispenses charity, a part of which may come from this fund. It is to be supposed that the States in the natural and normal course of procedure would be willing to utilize some of the existing methods of distribution. In many cities they have the community chest. The duty is imposed upon the States of supervising the expenditure of that money by the community chest. If it does not suit the taste of the bureau here in Washington, looking through the red tape and papers that would be piled up mountain high in every individual case, then the certificate is revoked and they get no more money. If any one doubts that, let him read paragraph 11 of the bill.

What does that mean? It is going to an extent to which no bureau has ever dreamed of going in the past, except during that hateful period of our history—the reconstruction era—when the "bacon" was distributed to obtain Republican votes in Alabama.

I now invite attention to lines 9 and 10, page 12, in the closing part of the bill. In order that there might be no doubt about the finality of the board's decision, in order that there might be no question raised by any person at any time as to their full and complete and sweeping authority, that section provides:

> In either case the decision of the board as to the purpose of any expenditure shall be final.

There we are with rules on top of rules, papers on top of papers, delay on top of delay, with a new bureau established for the purpose of telling the States, the counties, the municipalities, and the community chests who shall administer to the sick and the needy and the hungry, and to prove the superiority of expert charity over that which comes bubbling up freely from the human heart like water on the mountain side.

Mr. President, every added Federal prerogative is one less local responsibility. This question touches more than 10,000,000 homes. It is for us to decide whether we are to embark on a complete new policy; whether the time has arrived when no longer can we depend upon the administration of charity to the sick and the needy by their neighbors and friends, but that it must be done by experts selected by an expert bureau in the city of Washington.

The substitute proposal recognizes human need; it recognizes the responsibility on the part of the Federal Government to aid in meeting this need. It recognizes it fairly and squarely and meets the issue in a fundamental democratic method. It meets it by the belief that we can best preserve the most sacred traditions of this Nation by leaving, as far as we can, the homes of this country uninvaded by professional agents sent out by a Federal charity bureau located in Washington.

We propose, in the first place, that the Federal Government shall meet its responsibility, in part, by a program of public works. We do not claim that this program is adequate. It will be no more adequate than will be the program of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. Both of them barely touch the surface. We have reached a time in the history of this country when we must face the situation squarely of advancing poverty in the midst of growing civilization and growing plenty. It is a problem which calls for the best thought of the Nation, but it does not require, in order that we may put a little whitewash or paint over a festering sore, a departure from those sacred principles of government upon which this Republic rests.

We propose as a substitute, in the first place, an appropriation of $375,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury without requiring that it be matched by the States. This is a new policy. It is a policy upon which we embark in recognition of the fact that this is a national problem and that it thereby becomes our duty to see that the Government of this Nation steps in and makes a contribution to the general welfare.

We do not believe that the people themselves will be helped if we take away from them the right to administer their own affairs in their own way and in their own communities. It is not a question of opposing Federal aid. We recognize that the time has arrived when Federal aid should not only be invoked but should be utilized to aid the suffering people of this country; but we are not willing to see the States and the people pay the enormous price and make the tremendous sacrifice of surrendering the most sacred right given to American citizens—that of administering their own affairs pertaining to their own families and their own firesides in their own way.

The $375,000,000 to be appropriated for road construction can be used to give people employment. It is my own belief that there is not a decent, upstanding American citizen anywhere in this Nation who has not been injured by the reception of charity, and who would not say, if his voice could be heard, "What we want is a job or a chance to work." I do not claim that $375,000,000 will put all the people to work any more than $375,000,000 will feed all who are not securing sufficient food in this poverty-stricken Nation to-day. I might explain "poverty stricken" by referring to the millions of poverty stricken in the midst of great wealth and modern civilization. But if this fund is advanced people can be put to work. I do not know exactly how many, but I do know that I have been informed by the Bureau of Public Roads that $375,000,000 would put to work more than 1,000,000 people over a period of a month. We know that that would partially relieve the burden of the unemployed; we know that it would put money into circulation in the various parts of the country, and that a dollar released on roads or other public-works program will help to carry on commercial activities.

There is no 60-day delay provided in the substitute. I do not know about the other States, but I know that the highway commissioner of my State testified last week before a committee of the Senate that his plans for road construction were ready and that he could put them into effect in 10 days' time.

I also desire to call attention to the fact that Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania, who testified before the committee in a very able manner, stated that one of the problems in his State was that they did not have sufficient money with which to continue their highway projects. I would also like to call the attention of the Senate to an article that appeared recently in a highway-engineering magazine with reference to the Pennsylvania solution of this problem in part, whereby they have put men to work and are building highways at an expense of $5,000 per mile and are using the maximum of human labor, just as is provided in the proposed substitute.

We do not provide in the substitute for any 60 days' delay, as I have said; nor do we provide a new Washington bureau. No experts from Washington are called upon to administer the fund. The highway department estimates that 91 per cent of all the money which is utilized for public work goes to human labor.

There is a big mistake in the general idea as to the contribution of the Federal Government to good roads. The total of money spent for all roads in 1929 was about $3,000,000,000. The Federal contributions were $75,000,000, or about 2½ per cent. In 1931, with all the so-called added impetus that was given to the road-building program, the Government's percentage was less than 4 per cent. The cities, States, and counties spent 96 per cent. The money raised there is largely by taxes on homes and on real estate. Money raised by the Federal Government can be raised by utilizing its power to tax those who are best able to pay. The amendment is drawn with that knowledge confronting us.

I claim, Mr. President, that the Government has not been contributing its part for building up the national-highway system. I can cite Mr. Coolidge on the question of good roads. By reason of his general attitude on public questions, I should think that his statement with reference to this subject would give it weight. Mr. Coolidge said:

> No expenditure of public money contributes so much to national wealth as building good roads.

I am not one of those who subscribe to the doctrine that the only thing worth considering in this country is wealth, but that seems to play a very important part in all public questions. Doctor Klein said:

> The extent and quality of a nation's roadways determine to a high degree its rank in the civilization of the present day.

Roads are national. They have aided in building up the automobile industry. It is impossible for the States of this Union to obtain their proportionate part of the wealth which has been contributed to the automobile industry unless we use the taxing power of the Government for the purpose of taking a part of that money in taxes and utilizing it on good roads throughout the Nation.

It is said that one automobile manufacturer made a billion dollars in the automobile business. He manufactures a good automobile. Whether the fact that he has made that much in a short period of time is proof of the statement made in a recent history that he either sold his automobiles too high or paid his labor too little I do not know, but I do know that every State in this Union has contributed to the manufacturers of those automobiles; the farmers on the hillsides of the West and in the valleys of the South have contributed to them; and I claim that it is correct and justifiable for the Federal Government to contribute more than it has contributed in the past to a national system of highways.

Who gets the most advantage out of the modern paved public highway? Is it the farmer who works down there on his 1-horse farm, perhaps mortgaged to the last acre? It is not. From all over this land people travel over those highways; and we believe that the $375,000,000 for good roads is justified both on the ground of employment and on the ground of the Federal Government contributing its part.

Now, I desire to say a few words with reference to the second feature of this bill.

The second feature provides $375,000,000 to be loaned to the States. We have recognized in the bill that this calls for national action. We have believed, as shown in the first part, that the Government should seek to give employment. With that in view, I desire to send to the desk and have read the pertinent portions of a telegram from Mr. Mervin Sterne, of Birmingham, Ala. Mr. Sterne was chairman of the community-chest drive. I wired him and asked that he send to me a statement of his belief as to the conditions in Birmingham, and asked that he give me his viewpoint as to Federal assistance; and I desire to have his telegram read at this juncture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., February 2, 1932.

Hon. HUGO L. BLACK,
United States Senate:

Answering your telegram, I do not believe Federal assistance is necessary or desirable to take care of destitute in Birmingham if direct appropriation for relief with Federal administration is meant. Our relief problem has developed to be much greater than that estimated when community chest budget was made, and we shall probably not be able to go through year without further campaign for individual contributions or else substantial assistance from both county and city. Community chest agencies now administering direct family relief to approximately 9,000 families in Jefferson County, composed of approximately 45,000 people. Our estimate was that maximum number of families to be cared for would not go over 7,000 at peak, and it now appears that we shall have peak load of 10,000. Expenditure for direct relief was about $55,000 in December, 1931, against estimated maximum of $35,000 and against December, 1930, expenditure of $22,000. Figures for January not yet complete, but will probably run substantially higher than December and February expected to be peak month of winter. Relief required per family increasing despite reduction in food prices because of exhaustion of outside resources. Community chest pays no rent, so landlords of 9,000 families are likewise suffering from their lack of employment, as is Federal Government by reason of reduction of income tax from landlords, and so on to everyone. It would be big help if Government would turn its wheat supply over to Red Cross for distribution. As to broader question of relief, I see no way to take care of unemployment victims except to furnish them jobs, and think Federal Government can enormously aid situation by releasing immediately substantial sum for needed public works. Alabama needs some $10,000,000 to pave important roads now ready for surfacing, such as principal roads to Atlanta, Memphis, Chattanooga, and New Orleans. State does not have funds to match Federal appropriations. A great part of this work could be started immediately if Government would appropriate five to ten million dollars. Think it essential that Government not interfere with prices for either labor or material but have contracts let to lowest bidders.

The surest way to restore confidence, bring money out of hiding, and start business in its normal course is to give people jobs, and Federal Government is only agency with sufficient credit and sufficient needs to inaugurate this. Out of 9,000 families receiving community chest assistance, about 800 represent normal winter load and rest are victims of unemployment and are completely self-sustaining in normal times. City has 12,712 applications for jobs on park work at $2 per day for three days work per week. This work practically stopped account inability city to market at satisfactory price bonds already authorized, and Federal Government could give great assistance here and elsewhere by assisting municipalities with such financing. I have discussed these questions with president of community chest and chairman of Red Cross chapter, both of whom concur in these several opinions expressed.

M. H. STERNE.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it is not my intention to speak long upon the second phase of this amendment. It is my understanding that my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], will discuss that feature of the bill probably to-morrow. I do desire to say just a few more words, however, with reference to the second feature, and the reasons why in my individual judgment this is a national problem and the reasons why in my individual judgment the solution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], instead of adding to the sum total of human happiness in this country in the future, would result in retarding the great progressive movement of the people in order to curb existing abuses and more nearly bring about justice in the economic world.

It is my belief that this is a national problem because the National Government itself, in my judgment, has aided in bringing it about.

It is my belief that the law with reference to tariffs, so ably discussed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] to-day, has played its part; the growing encouragement on the part of the Government and the administration to the existence of monopolies and trusts; the great power that is given to men to exploit the people of this Nation so as to drain money from the pockets of those who produce and put it in the pockets of those "who toil not, neither do they spin."

It is my belief that the Government has contributed in part to this problem because by the Constitution we are given the right to regulate the issuance of money, and it has been regulated in such a way that to-day everything in this country has gone down except gold and mortgages.

It is my belief that the special privilege which has been fostered by this and preceding administrations, that has drained the wealth of the remote sections of this country in order to fill the pockets of those who did not produce that wealth, has aided in bringing about a condition where we must look daily upon millions of people on the verge of starvation in the midst of growing plenty and wealth.

It is my belief that the Government has contributed to the problem by permitting an unfair exploitation of the resources of this Nation, which were given for the benefit of all the people; that it has permitted some to take the products of nature, combined with the product of labor, and bring on a condition where millions must look with longing upon an ostentatious display of wealth which they produced and of food which they can not eat.

There is an unbalanced condition in our economic system. It is not geared properly between production and consumption. Those who produce have not received their proportionate part of the results of their own toil and their own labor; but, on the contrary, it has been diverted by numerous schemes of trust manipulations and trickery such as was evidenced a short time ago in the exposure of a small group in the largest city of this Nation which had extracted $1,000,000,000 in commissions for the sale of worthless bonds to the people of this Nation.

I believe, however, that the greatest blessing any country can have is that when injustice has continued and when abuses make themselves a part of the body politic so that the people see that their rights are being trampled upon, they can rise in righteous indignation and remove from office those who have trampled upon their rights.

This is a government of people and of law. We have ample protection under our laws for the people to protest against injustice. We are to-day at the cross-roads. These are the times that try men's souls. I do not personally believe there has been a more important period in this country's history since the Declaration of Independence was given to the world. We want a good, wholesome discontent on the part of the people who are treated unjustly. I subscribe to the doctrine of Thomas Jefferson on that point. We do not want to turn their minds wholly upon getting something without toil. We do want them to insist and demand that they have the results of their own labor and their own toil.

If we once embark upon a scheme whereby the Federal Government, with a Federal bureau, begins to feed people out of Federal funds, with directions from Washington, we shall have made a complete and total departure from the time-honored principles of this Government. It is quite different from appropriating a Federal fund to take care of drought relief. It is quite different from appropriating a Federal fund for the use of the military in supplying tents for those who need shelter.

Last year most of us on the Democratic side voted for a proposal to add $25,000,000 on to an appropriation bill, the money to be given to the Red Cross for distribution. The people in various sections of this country were hungry from a drought. We had tried in vain to follow the time-honored method which had been adopted in this body in extending relief. I do not hesitate to say now, and I shall never hesitate to say, that if I ever reach the conclusion that the only way to feed hungry people is by appropriating money out of the Federal Treasury direct, with a new bureau, I should vote for that method; but I think that if we ever reach that time, we will be marking the beginning of the end.

The lesson of the centuries has been taught in vain, history has spoken without results, if we do not recognize here and now that we have reached a crucial point in our history, if we embark with the Federal Government in our dual system upon a scheme of giving such power as is proposed to a bureau in Washington, with its greed and its unsatisfied hunger for money and for power.

Mr. President, the substitute we have offered provides for relief the same sum covered by the original bill, $375,000,000, and in addition a like sum for immediate public-works program. It recognizes the duty of the Federal Government in this present national emergency.

I congratulate those Senators who upon this floor from time to time have spoken and worked for a large public-works program. In my own way I have also insisted that such should be done for a period of more than two years.

Three hundred and seventy-five million dollars, in my individual judgment, is not a sufficient amount for the Government to contribute on a Government-works program in order to furnish jobs for the needy; but it is a beginning, and it will be a recognition, really for the first time, if this measure shall be enacted into law, that we, recognizing the terrible distress which exists in this country, are willing to have the Federal Government supplement the efforts of the States, cities, and municipalities by a public-works program. In addition to that, we recognize that, in the present financial storm which has swept over this Nation, it may be difficult for the States, cities, and counties to borrow money, more difficult than it is for the Federal Government to borrow money.

How long the present condition will continue nobody knows. In so far as I was individually concerned, I am glad to say that I voted against the $2,000,000,000 corporation, because I believed that we should adopt a public-works program and utilize our bond-selling power for that purpose.

We now present to this body a program under which the Government would lend money to the States. The complaint has been that the States will not pay it back. The complaint has also been that the legislation provides for a subterfuge and not a real loan. If it is a subterfuge, why should those who want the hungry to be fed be the first to raise that objection? If it be true that the object is to feed the hungry, and not to stand for any particular measure or particular plan, who should raise his voice against the bill because he contends, forsooth, that the States might not pay the money back, and in the same breath says he wants to feed the hungry and minister to the distressed?

The measure provides for a loan to be made to the States. Whether they will pay the money back or not I do not know. An amendment has been suggested, which will doubtless be accepted, providing that if the money is not paid back within three years it may be deducted year after year from the fund for Federal-aid road relief. Whether we will be out of the present condition in three years only the future can tell.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether the amendment prepared by himself and the two other Senators has yet been offered as a substitute?

Mr. BLACK. It has not been offered; I am going to offer it when I conclude my remarks.

Mr. PITTMAN. When the Senator has offered it I will offer the amendment to the substitute he is now discussing.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I would like to ask the Senator how he proposes to have the Government get the money with which to build the roads and to make the loans to the States. I have read the proposal he has in mind, and I fail to find any plan of financing in his proposal. Would the Senator enlighten us on that matter?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. There is no plan of financing in the proposal. No such provision was put in, because of the fact that a tax bill is now being worked upon, and there is no doubt but that if the money is appropriated some satisfactory method will be adopted for raising the funds. I have my own individual ideas as to the proper way of raising the funds, which might not be consistent with the ideas of some others. I have my own idea about the kind of tax bill we should eventually pass and upon whom the burdens should be most heavily laid.

Personally, it is my opinion that there will be required a large increase in taxes on the larger income-tax brackets, on the inheritance taxes, and a gift tax, and that, in addition, there will probably be required the sale of either short or long time bonds in order to make provision for appropriations of this kind.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The matter concerning which the Senator from Oklahoma has inquired had the consideration of those who have stood sponsors for the substitute to be offered for the bill under consideration. But they determined not to attempt to make any provision of the character inquired of by the Senator from Oklahoma lest it should precipitate a controversy with the House of Representatives, which would contend that the bill was one for raising revenue, which should originate in the House of Representatives. I myself was not ready to yield to the contention that it would be subject to the provision of the Constitution requiring that bills for raising revenue be originated in the House of Representatives, but the question is involved in so much doubt that it was deemed inadvisable to precipitate a controversy with the other branch of the Congress upon that question. So that the matter of providing funds would be left to the good judgment of the House in the first instance, and subsequently, when the proper bill comes here, to the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, just a few more words, and I will be through.

In discussing the difference between leaving the administration of this fund to the people who come in contact with daily need and suffering, and the surrender by the States and the people to the Federal Government of their last remaining prerogative, I desire to read a brief extract from a most excellent article written by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and published in Nation's Business in 1927, in which the Senator made the following statement:

> The right and authority of the people to manage and control their own affairs of an immediate and local nature, affairs peculiar to the community or the State, is beyond all price. There is nothing for which the people can afford to exchange it. It is the most genuine democratic principle found in our entire structure of government. It means more to the happiness, the dignity and the power of the people than any other right they are permitted to enjoy. Destroy it, and the average citizen becomes the victim of bureaucratic interference, annoyed constantly by its persistent intrusions upon the affairs of his daily life and burdened by its chronic inefficiency and habitual waste.
> If there ever was a real struggle for popular rule and for the preservation of the popular voice in politics and government, it is in this effort to conserve for the people the right to control and administer their local affairs in accordance with local wisdom and local conditions.
> Unless we mend our ways, there will not be a custom, practice, or habit but must be censored from Washington. There will be nothing in all the relationship of parent and child, of family and home, sufficiently private to exempt it from the furtive eye of a Federal agent. I venture to say that coming generations, when they awake to the deliberate robbery and wanton devastation of their heritage of local self-government and begin to satisfy the tortures and burdens of such a system as will follow, will denounce in unmeasured terms those who have spinelessly frittered away their rights.

Mr. President, if it be true, as was stated by one of the Senators on this floor, that there have been Federal-aid provisions which went anywhere near or approximately to the point this bill goes in creating a new bureau with a new power, then I say there is no better time to stop the practice than now.

In so far as Federal assistance to the various States is concerned, by reason of the fact that the Federal Government can place its hands upon taxes which the States can not reach, I favor Federal assistance, but if it is to be obtained at the price of frittering away the last remaining vestige of control of the people of this Nation over their homes and their firesides, then I say the price is too great.

When we think that all over this land are homes which hunger has invaded as an unwelcome guest, and think of the pain and suffering and the heartaches which exist, how can we reconcile ourselves to believe that those suffering can best be ministered to either by agents from Washington or by instructions from agents in Washington? Have we reached the pitiful stage in the history of the development of our country when our people in the various States have so far degraded themselves as they are not capable of ad-

Has the time really come when the people who engage in social work can say that leaving these activities to the people of the States contains no safeguard necessary to prevent unwise administration, to prevent a tremendous waste, but that the mere empowering of a bureau to administer the funds protects from waste? I ask whether there is anything in the history of the administration of the bureaus in Washington which leads one to the irresistible conclusion that they will be careful and cautious in the expenditure of funds?

The foundation principle of this Government is that the people are fit to rule and ought to rule. We have extended the right of franchise from time to time. We have taken away the property qualification, which in the early days of the history of this Government handicapped the average man upon a plane of equality with his fellow citizens of the State and Nation.

We have endeavored to place the plain, average, every-day man upon a plane of equality with his fellow citizens of the Republic. We have given to him political independence. We are, I hope, on the way to giving him economic independence. The two, of course, are entirely separate and distinct. Political independence without economic independence is not alone all we have intended to give the citizen of this Republic. His political independence can be taken away from him just as much by taking out of his hands the selection of officials as it can by depriving him of the privilege of the ballot.

When we administer local funds in the counties of Alabama we administer them through officials selected by the people. When we administer charitable funds in the State of Alabama we administer them by and through the supervision of officials elected by the people of the State of Alabama. But when we send those funds to Washington and administer them through a Federal bureau, independent of any power this side of another act of Congress, we take away from the people the right to say how their funds shall be administered. We give to this bureau the right to send its agents to invade the homes of the people of the Nation as they try to ascertain whether or not the people's quest for bread is based upon honor or upon falsehood. When we tell a bureau in Washington that it can go to California, to the State of Washington, to the State of Maine, to the State of New York, or elsewhere, and determine better how to administer charitable relief than the people of those sections themselves can, then I say that we have adopted the Hamiltonian principle 100 per cent, adopting the principle that the people are "beasts."

I am opposed to any such political philosophy. I stand squarely upon the Jeffersonian principle that the people of the Nation are worthy to be trusted. I claim that the more power we give to them the better our Government will be. I deny that any bureau can be selected by any politician in Washington that is better qualified to administer food to the people who are hungry and dying for bread than are those who live and walk and talk with them and hear their tales of sorrow and trouble with weeping and sympathetic hearts.

No, Mr. President; there is no effort to clandestinely fight any bill, not on my part and not on the part of any other. I stand against the measure of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. It is wrong in principle. It would tend to destroy the last vestige of independence on the part of the people of the United States. It is establishing a Federal bureau with powers unequaled since the day when the Roman proletariat looked for and accepted the crumbs as they fell from the tables of the rich.

It touches not the cause. It makes no effort to curb monopoly. It makes no effort to change the currency system that has raised the price of everything but gold and mortgages. It makes no effort to curb the growing power of trusts. It makes no attack on the plutocracy of this Nation as it revels in the toil and the labor of suffering millions of the people of this Nation. It does not do that. It creates a new bureau to corrupt, to undermine, to bribe the poor and hungry and unemployed and take their minds off of the healthy political discontent that should result from injustice and abuse, to make them nothing in the world but beggars as they stand with outstretched hands and say, "Who that is running for office will agree to give me more than the other man?" It is an attempt to transfer the issues upheld in the political forums of this Nation from those between the principles of government to the issue of who will give the most. It is proposed to give to a bureau a political power which has not been known in this Government since the beginning of its history.

No, Mr. President; the price is too great. So far as I am concerned I can not pay it. I deny that there is any man within the sound of my voice who has any more reason to feel a touch of human sympathy and human kindness and human generosity for the poor downtrodden masses of America than I have. I deny, because I fight this bill as it is written, that it can be justly said that I desire to see anybody starve. I want a government which is operated for all the people. I want the political issues fought out, not on the pleasing voice of the silver tongue of a man who will promise his votes in the next Congress for the votes of the people who are unemployed, but I want it to be fought out on the real fundamental underlying issues which divide the people of this Nation as they always have been divided in the past. There have always been issues. There have been several groups. There have been some who have been willing to barter away the birthright of the people for a temporary mess of pottage. There have been others who are willing to stand and fight against special privilege, plutocracy, and greed wherever it is found, and to assert that the fundamental principle of government is that the people should have the right to earn their living by hard work.

The greatest miracle of all the world is the ability of a man to forget his cares and worries as he buries himself in honest, wholesome toil and genuine labor, as he works as nature and God intended that he should work. No, Mr. President, I can not go to the extent, either now or hereafter, of saying that it is good for the people to establish a new bureau in Washington with the power of self-perpetuation, immortal as it will be, with the power to punish the people of my State in order to reward the people of another, with power to say to the people of Alabama, "I do not like the agencies your State has selected to minister to the poor. I do not like the agencies your counties have selected to minister to the poor. I do not like the agencies your churches and your community chests, your lodges, and other orders have selected to minister to the poor."

No, Mr. President; if it be technical to fight that kind of a measure, please God I shall continue to stand upon such technicalities so long as I am honored by my State to represent them in part in the Senate of the United States, the chosen representatives of the people of the sovereign States of this Union.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. I would like to have it read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 5 strike out the period, insert a colon, and add:

Provided further, That if within three years after the approval of this act any State to which advances have been made under sections 3, 4, and 5 of this act has not made provision for the repayment of the same, there shall be deducted thereafter for each of the following years an amount equal to one-fifth part of the sums so advanced from any sums that would be paid to any such State by virtue of allocations from any appropriation or appropriations that may be made pursuant to and to carry out the purposes of the Federal highway act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair submit an inquiry to the Senator from Nevada? Does the Senator from Nevada wish to have the amendment to the amendment considered as pending?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; as pending. I was going to ask the Senators offering the substitute whether they would accept it, but I will have to do that later.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I inquire if the substitute has been formally offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal clerk informs the Chair that the substitute has not been formally offered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I shall be glad to offer it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Alabama has now been offered. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] offers an amendment to that amendment, which will be regarded as pending.

Mr. WALSH of Montana subsequently said: Mr. President, I am authorized by my associates joining with me in sponsoring the substitute for the pending bill to announce on their behalf and my own that the amendment to the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is accepted, and the substitute is amended accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be considered as modified by the incorporation of the additional proviso proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

PROHIBITION OF PURCHASE OF OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I would apologize to the Senate for intruding at this time, except for the reason that many Members of the House, being apprised of the fact that I have gathered certain information which is pertinent to be considered in connection with appropriation bills, have asked me that I present the information as early as possible.

I desire to introduce a bill prohibiting the use of public funds for the purchase of butter substitutes by any civil or military officer or employee for use in any department, bureau, independent establishment, or other agency of the United States Government.

The bill (S. 3572) to prohibit the use of public funds for the purchase of oleomargarine was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAINE. On April 17, 1930, I called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations pertinent facts respecting the use of oleomargarine in Federal institutions as a substitute for butter. My remarks will be found in the RECORD of the date mentioned, on pages 7226 to 7229, volume 72, part 7. At that time I submitted tables showing the quantity of butter and butter substitutes used in Federal institutions for the year ending June 30, 1929.

Since that time I have obtained reports from the several Federal institutions on the same subject for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1930, and June 30, 1931 (except as otherwise stated in the reports), and I shall ask that the reports be printed as a part of my remarks at the close of what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. BLAINE. There has been an improvement in some of the institutions. I call attention to the fact that in the fiscal year 1929, at the National Soldiers' Home at Augusta, Me., no butter was used. That institution since has recognized in part that butter is an essential diet for old soldiers and served some butter for the fiscal year 1931.

The same comment can be made regarding the soldiers' homes at Danville, Ill., and in Virginia. Neither of those institutions served butter to the old soldiers in the fiscal year 1929. Both have shown marked improvement over 1929, and now recognize that butter is an essential element in the dietary for the old soldier.

However, the only national soldiers' institution that recognizes that butter substitutes have no place in the dietary of these older men is the institution at Bath, N. Y.

The United States Veterans' Bureau advises that no butter substitutes are served for table use, their use being limited to seasoning in cooking, and thus the Veterans' Bureau continues to recognize the proper diet for those in the institutions under that bureau. I might add here that the administration of the veterans' hospitals shows a marked increase in the use of butter for the fiscal year 1931 over the fiscal year 1929.

The report on the penal and correctional institutions and prison camps shows a very meager use of butter—in fact, a diminishing use of butter for the fiscal years beginning 1930, and a mounting use of butter substitutes.

In my analysis of this matter for the fiscal year 1929 I did not have the report from the Indian Service. I am now able to report on that service for most of the schools and agencies. The report shows that a large amount of butter substitutes is served to the Indian children.

I want to call attention at this point to the fact that butter is an essential and necessary element in the diet of children, and surely the wards of the Government ought not to be so miserably neglected by their guardian.

I particularly call attention to St. Elizabeths Hospital for the Insane, near Washington. All medical authority recognizes that butterfat is essential for the welfare and in the treatment of those suffering from mental diseases. Reputable and distinguished physicians in the United States have expressed their astonishment when informed of the fact that this institution for the insane has served no butter; that is, served none to the inmates. It has served some in the cafeteria for employees and others, and the employees have the choice of butter or butter substitutes. Those suffering from mental afflictions, however, have no choice. Dietitians express the greatest condemnation of those charged with the responsibility of treating and caring for the insane when they fail to recognize that butter is an essential element in the dietary for insane. Those in authority at St. Elizabeths Hospital for the Insane boast that they have "one of the finest herds of dairy cattle in the country," and yet the inmates are forced to eat substitutes for butter.

Before closing I call attention to the fact that in the appropriation acts for the fiscal year 1932 prohibitions on the use of butter substitutes were inserted in the acts making appropriations for the Army and the Veterans' Administration, including the national soldiers' homes. I also call attention to the fact that in the Navy rations are fixed by law which require a daily allowance of 2 ounces of butter per person.

I also call attention to the fact that most of the Indian schools have their own herds of dairy cattle, and the table to be inserted indicates to what extent there is a lack of use of butter and a large use of butter substitutes.

On the tables I desire now to insert are certain footnotes and references attached so that the whole story may be told.

I have also had tabulated the totals for the fiscal year 1931, and ask that that, together with the detailed reports, be here inserted in the RECORD in the order in which I have had them compiled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the bill introduced by me be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF THE MAILS TO UNSOLICITED MERCHANDISE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD a brief letter from Mr. Homer E. Minor, of Plainview, Tex., relating to the bill prohibiting the mailing of unsolicited merchandise.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAINVIEW, TEX., February 2, 1932.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Friends tell me that you are always interested in helping those who have had to overcome handicaps, physical or otherwise, so I am writing direct to you regarding a situation that to me is indeed desperate.

I understand that Senate bill 1663, prohibiting mailing of unsolicited merchandise, has been reported on the Senate floor. It may be too late to do anything about this matter now, but I shall greatly appreciate it if you will take time to read this letter and give this matter your earnest consideration, and if still possible to do so lend your influence against this bill.

One department of my business is my greeting-card department, selling $1 boxes of Christmas cards by mail. Over 90 per cent of these cards are mailed "on approval" to my regular customers, who buy them from year to year, but who always want to see the cards before paying for them. Just as any salesman calls without permission so my Christmas cards go to a few names each year, but the majority of the cards are sent to my own customers, who have requested that they be sent, the others being sent at the request of a friend or one of my customers.

While it is true that some people object to receiving unsolicited merchandise of any kind by mail, I receive hundreds of letters from people thanking me for sending the cards to them. If you could see some of these letters—I shall be glad to send them to you if you wish—you would know that far more people appreciate this method of business and the service I am rendering them than the number of people who object to this method of selling. My sales are largely to small towns and rural communities, to those who do not have an opportunity to purchase locally.

Of course I always send postage for the return of the cards if not wanted, and it is very little trouble to return the cards. I do not use any objectionable methods to force payment for the cards and I never demand payment anyway, so there can be no objection to my method of collecting or inquiring about the cards.

If I want to send out the cards and take a chance on their being retained and paid for, lost in the mails, or kept and never paid for, it seems that this should be my own business, and of course I do not expect the Post Office Department to help me collect for them or to be responsible for the cards in any way, except to give good and fair service in delivering them to my customers, and as I pay the full postage for this purpose, that is no more than they should do, and is certainly not an accommodation on their part.

I can not understand why the Post Office Department objects so strenuously to the "on approval" business, as they derive millions of dollars they would not receive otherwise from postage for the boxes of cards, postage for sending the payments for the cards, postage for sending out notices regarding the cards, money-order fees, etc.

Concerns who attempt to impose inferior goods on intelligent Americans not only deserve to fail but they do fail. The rule of business to-day is give value or quit business. That is why I believe that the mail-order card business will naturally fall or rise of its own weight, and I fail to see that it is any concern of the Government as to whether or not we continue to do business in this way.

Of course, you are not familiar with my business, so I would like to tell you that I have worked hard to build this up, starting in with less than $20, and now own the largest mail-order greeting card business and magazine subscription agency in the Southwest. You can understand that one in a wheel chair must work just a little bit harder; that it is not always easy to accomplish the things you want to do. It really isn't a handicap; it's an incentive to greater effort. I can honestly say that should this bill pass it will be impossible for me to continue my business, and I feel that I can not afford to lose everything now.

My sending Christmas cards out in this manner has been a great help to the local post office, raising it to first-class rating, and I have been told that I am responsible for the fact that we are to get a new Federal building this year. My postage expenses average around $25,000 annually. In addition, it affects business locally, for during the rush season I employ around 50 girls, and the printer has to employ more help, etc., so generally it would affect business quite a bit if we were forced to discontinue this method of business.

I believe that you can conscientiously oppose this bill if you will give it your earnest consideration; so won't you please do this? I know it is important that some action be taken at once, so anything you can do will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

HOMER E. MINOR.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON SALE OF FOREIGN SECURITIES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably Senate Concurrent Resolution 12, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) submitted by Mr. SMOOT on the 2d instant was read; and there being no objection, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 2,000 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee during the current session on Sale of Foreign Bonds or Securities in the United States.

PRINTING OF ARTICLE ENTITLED "HONEST AND DISHONEST SILVER MONEY"

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably with an amendment Senate Resolution 154, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been submitted by Mr. SHIPSTEAD on January 28, 1932. The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "document," to strike out "in the usual number, that 100 additional copies be printed, of which 50 shall be for the use of the Senate Document Room and 50 for the use of the House Document Room," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the English translation of the artitcle written by Dr. Gottfried Kunwald, of Vienna, entitled "Honest and Dishonest Silver Money," be printed as a Senate document.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Glory be to Thee, O Lord Most High. May all the ends of the earth remember and turn unto the Lord and all the kindred of the nations worship before Thee. In Thee may they trust, and let them never be put to shame. Mry this Congress feel how very important its place is. Deliver us from any lack of earnestness and enthuse us with the responsibility of true manhood. Keep in all our hearts the declarations and the counsels of God. We pray for any who be bearing burdens that they may be enabled to bear them courageously. Thou who art the infinite face of love, hope, and light, fill our own beloved land and the whole earth with Thy glory and come and reign over all. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 5, 1932, was read and approved.

LOANS TO FARMERS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act provides that $50,000,000 shall be set aside for the purpose of aiding agriculture. The Department of Agriculture has provided rules and regulations governing the method that will be employed in loaning this money. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of these regulations may be inserted in the RECORD at this point so that Members and the people of the country generally will know the exact procedure to be followed to obtain this aid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are these regulations prepared by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Will the gentleman state whether or not this is the final report of the Department of Agriculture on these regulations?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I will not say it is the final report, but it is the report which gives the rules and regulations that are necessary to follow in order to obtain this money.

Mr. KETCHAM. The point I have in mind is this: I think I am correct in stating that this is sent up merely as a suggested plan, with a view of asking suggestions from Members of Congress, and that this is not the final revision, and that within a very few days, possibly four or five, the final revision will come out.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I will read what the letter of transmittal says:

I am inclosing herewith a copy of the regulations which it is proposed to issue under the authority of section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, approved January 22, 1932, to make loans to farmers to finance crop production in 1932.

Very truly yours, ARTHUR M. HYDE,
Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If these are the final regulations, it seems to me the better way would be to have them printed as a public document.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a good one provided this information is made available.

Mr. SNELL. I suggest the gentleman take that up with the Printing Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including a statement sent to him by the Department of Agriculture showing the method by which it is proposed to administer the loans under the $50,000,000 fund provided in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] says that these are not the final regulations. What is the use of printing them unless they are?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Inasmuch as they have gone into detail here, unless there is some opposition or additional suggestions, I take it that these will be the final rules and regulations governing the loaning of this money. I have no desire to clutter up the RECORD with anything that ought not to be printed in it, but I think this is very important, and we are receiving requests from all over the country asking for these facts.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman should put it through the Printing Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADDRESS OF HON. TOM YON, OF FLORIDA

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech delivered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YON] at the Democratic conference at Marianna, Fla., November 28, 1931.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech of Hon. TOM YON at the Democratic conference at Marianna, Fla., November 28, 1931:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, this is an assemblage of Democrats to promote the best interest of the party, both of State and Nation. The records of the Republican Party for the past 10 years or more has been one in which they have tried one expediency after another, trying to solve world problems which they themselves have created and brought about by their selfish political chicanery in their effort to destroy the Democratic Party and discredit its great war President during the years immediately following the armistice.

The leadership of Mr. Lodge, Republican, and his force in the Senate started the struggle that has led to the present economic conditions in the world. From time to time the racial and national animosities of our citizens, who have sprung from one European nation or another, were excited to such an extent that they did not consider reason nor the best interests of the Nation in trying to get even with the Democratic Party, under whose leadership we had fought the war to successful conclusion. Many of our population, being of stock of our enemy, as well as some of our dissatisfied allied nations were so aroused by the misrepresentation of the enemies of the President and of the Democratic Party that they were led to do in this country the very thing that has led up to the undoing of their fatherland. They aided in defeating not only the Democratic Party but the principles for which the Democratic Party stood.

Following the separate treaty with the leader of the Central Powers in the war and the unrest that became evident in Europe, followed by France's move into the Valley of the Ruhr, we were given the Dawes, the Young plan, and now the moratorium, which the present head of the Republican Party offered as another temporary expediency for the ills of this country, expecting to get by to-day and let to-morrow take care of itself, as well as the rest of the world. I mention these facts, that the sources from which our economic difficulties come, because Republicans are now urging to escape responsibilities for what they have done by claiming that our troubles are all on account of the world-wide depression. I want you to understand that the party that has been in power, in full charge of the Government for the past 11 years, is entirely responsible for these conditions, and the people are coming to know it. The day of judgment is at hand, and the Republicans are trying to find an alibi.

Then what else? We remember what happened in connection with Teapot Dome, and the little black bag sent by Doheny, and the acceptance of same, and for which Mr. Fall is now serving a little time, also Mr. Sinclair's jail sentence, as a fact of the outcome of those scandalous times of Harding's administration.

The 8 or 10 years following, 1921 to 1929, Wall Street international bankers took advantage of market for foreign loans and marketed billions of dollars of European securities here to our American citizens, for which these bankers derived great profit in the way of commissions. They are now endeavoring to create sentiment for cancellation of foreign debts due our Government for no other reason than that possibly the loans through Wall Street might be collected from the nations of Europe while the people pay in taxes what the foreign nations owe to us. I am against such on the part of our Government.

In 1927 I was in New York and got hold of a copy of a New York paper in which was a news story in the financial section of that paper that stated that 20 banks on Wall Street had made a profit of over $70,000,000 in marketing securities of foreign governments. This did not include the interest on the bonds. These same bankers acting as agents to obtain from foreign nations oil and other concessions that persons high in official position in this Republican administration might be beneficiaries to a large extent.

In the meantime, prior to the crash in the fall of 1929, a bull market was in progress; consolidations, mergers, and combines, encouraged by optimistic assurance by Republicans, were the order of the day. Billions of stock were unloaded on the public, was permitted by the administration in power—the Republicans. Widows and orphans, working people, old people were deceived and lost their last penny. With the stocks marketed hardly able to return 1 per cent on one-fourth of the value, and the administration in Washington, either in the Treasury or other departments, giving encouragement to the bulls by handing out statements that the foundation of business was firm and sufficiently strong to maintain such a market, the substance of the Nation was sucked into the world stream, when all along they, the administration leaders, should have known better.

Of course the economic life of our country was not on a safe basis, for at that time agriculture was in a depressed condition. Farm values had decreased around $10,000,000,000 in value since the beginning of 1921. Banks, especially in the agricultural States, had failed by the hundreds. Farmers were in debt, farm mortgages being foreclosed, and all of that, yet with a rank speculation on one side, and mortgage foreclosures on the other; and even though the administration in Washington should have known that such a lopsided economic condition could not stand, yet encouraging statements to the very last were handled out; and even after the crash in the fall of 1929, these leaders kept up the chorus, and are even now, with millions out of employment and farm commodity prices at almost their lowest in over 30 years, saying that business is on the upgrade.

I say that the Republican Party and big business has failed dismally in keeping this country in a condition whereby want and misery will have no place within its bounds. The practice of running the Government in the interest of special privilege to make the rich richer and the poor poorer is all wrong.

In so far as the Republican Party being a party of prosperity, that myth has been exploded. Of course, in the past many voters in America have been intimidated around election times by bosses of industrial corporations, who would pass the word around that if a Democrat was elected for President on election day that their plants would be shut down. These workers from now on will have a mind of their own. They have gone through these sad experiences, which have brought them to where they are to-day—with shops closed and no employment, not a chance to earn something whereby loved ones may be fed and clothed. In my own State some Democrats I have heard remark in campaigns prior to 1928 that they voted the Democratic ticket but hoped the Republicans would win, for it would mean better business and good times. I wonder how this class of Democrats feel about it now? I have always charged that this Republican prosperity myth was unfair, that the Democratic Party is equal, if not superior, in strength in its leadership in directing the affairs of a democratic government and in safety and security to honorable business.

Now, it will become the duty of the Democratic Party, I believe, and be their responsibility to elect a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress in 1932 to set this Government, business, and the economic life on their feet again, and our people will be given an opportunity to work out their salvation under equal opportunity. It will be a great responsibility. Under the last Democratic administration the Democrats put on the statute books some of the most beneficial legislation that this Nation has ever had the privilege to enjoy. Under the last Democratic administration the Federal reserve banking law was given us, and if it wasn't for it now I don't know what would have happened to us when this so-called depression broke upon us.

The Democrats in the House and the Democrats in the Senate in present Congress will have a constructive program, and the Democrats will support that program. In this connection, though, you must not expect too much of a Democratic House with a slender majority while the same Republican President is in the White House that was there when these troublous times came upon us, and also a Republican Senate; so just consider again that the Republicans are in power, but the Democrats will not attempt to retard but help work the country out of its present deplorable condition.

Now, we want to always as Democrats strive to perpetuate the principles of the founder of our party. Our party nationally needs the help of the Democrats of our State as well as of other States of the Union. Let us not divide and waste our strength in nonessential bickerings. There are too many fundamentals upon which the party strength ought to stand; and as a warning to all Americans, I will say, that sooner or later we will fail in our purpose and in the carrying on of a democratically operated government if the principles of the founder of our party is not maintained. The Nation needs the Democratic Party, for if we do not have a liberal Democratic Party fighting for and maintaining those Democratic principles that made our Nation great, then there is no telling what will become of it. Then let's all unite for the success of our party in both State and Nation, and not alone for sake of party victory, but for another and more patriotic purpose, and that is that our State and Nation are calling to us to restore our Government that it might again serve and be for all the people, truly a government of, for and by the people, equal rights to all, and special privileges to none.

SALARIES OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, at my request the Bureau of Efficiency has prepared a table, bringing it down to date, showing the number and amount of salaries of civilian employees of the executive branch of the Government and of the military personnel. It is prepared in a number of groups, showing the number of people who receive less than $1,000, and the amount paid for that group, and dividing all the employees into groups up to $15,000 and over. This table does not show the number of employees and their salaries of the legislative branch of the Government for the reason that the Bureau of Efficiency does not have that information. Neither does it include the Members of the House and the Senate and their salaries and the salaries and number of their clerks, and so forth.

Later on I expect to obtain that information as to the legislative branch, and later will ask unanimous consent to print that in the RECORD.

I now ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD this table to which I have referred, for the information of the Members and for purposes of study.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The table is as follows:

Number and cost of salaries of (a) civilian employees of the executive branch of the Government, and (b) military personnel

[1] The annual rate of pay of civilian employees is the gross rate of pay and includes annual allowances for quarters, subsistence, or other facilities or services furnished by the Government. The annual rate of pay of military personnel is the net rate of pay for both active and retired men. It does not include allowances as distinguished from pay.

[2] "Military" includes the military personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey.

[3] The "number in group" indicated at each rate of pay includes seasonal and temporary employees.

[4] The "cost for group" indicated at each rate of pay includes amounts paid to seasonal and temporary employees.

[5] The cumulative totals shown in columns lettered (e), (g), and (k), give the total number of persons receiving pay at an annual rate equal to or higher than the minimum rate indicated in column (a). The cumulative costs shown in columns lettered (e), (i), and (m), give the aggregate annual compensation of employees paid at an annual rate equal to or higher than the minimum rate indicated in column (a).

NOTE.—This is simply a restatement of the statement released by the Bureau of the Budget Jan. 30, 1932, the only difference being in the arrangement of the cumulative totals. In the statement of Jan. 30, 1932, the cumulative totals commence with the lowest salary rate. In this statement the cumulative totals commence with the highest salary rate.

Mr. RAINEY. I also submit the following two letters I have received from the United States Bureau of Efficiency for the information of the Members:

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY,
Washington, February 2, 1932.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAINEY: Reference is made to your letter of January 15, 1932, relative to the amount that could be saved annually by reducing 10 per cent or 25 per cent the salaries of employees of the Federal Government receiving more than $5,000 a year.

I inclose a table showing number and cost of salaries in the executive branch of the Government. This table, which includes both civil and military employees, was compiled by the Bureau of the Budget from the latest available information furnished by the departments and independent establishments.

I assume that it is the intention of your inquiry that no salary of more than $5,000 would be reduced below $5,000. Otherwise some persons receiving salaries above $5,000 would be reduced to rates less than $5,000 and to rates less than persons receiving salaries at $5,000 and less, who would be subjected to no reduction in pay. On this basis, the amount that would be saved by reducing salaries in excess of $5,000 10 per cent would be approximately $3,487,876. The amount that would be saved by a similar 25 per cent reduction would be approximately $6,012,865.

These estimates are computed as follows:

Ten per cent reduction above $5,000

Reduction of $5,000 to $5,199 group to $5,000	$29,054
Reduction of $5,200 to $5,399 group to $5,000	105,770
Reduction of $5,400 to $5,599 group to $5,000	[1] 125,752
Reduction of $5,600 and over group 10 per cent	3,227,300
	3,487,876

Twenty-five per cent reduction above $5,000

Reduction of $5,000 to $5,199 group to $5,000	$29,054
Reduction of $5,200 to $5,399 group to $5,000	105,770
Reduction of $5,400 to $5,599 group to $5,000	125,752
Reduction of $5,600 to $5,799 group to $5,000	821,850
Reduction of $5,800 to $5,999 group to $5,000	354,669
Reduction of $6,000 to $6,499 group to $5,000	1,979,775
Reduction of $6,500 to $6,999 group to $5,000	[1] 425,424
Reduction of $7,000 and over group, 25 per cent	2,143,571
	6,012,865

I shall be glad to furnish any further information that you may require.

Very truly yours,

HERBERT D. BROWN, Chief.

Inclosure.

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY,
Washington, February 4, 1932.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAINEY: In accordance with the verbal request you made to Mr. Littlejohn, of our staff, I am submitting an estimate of the annual savings that would be effected by reducing all Government salaries in excess of $2,000 a year 10 per cent. This estimate is based on the table prepared by the Bureau of the Budget which was submitted to you with my letter dated February 2, 1932. Both civil and military employees are included.

Assuming that it is intended that no salary of more than $2,000 be reduced below $2,000, the amount that would be saved approximates $55,382,465.

This estimate is computed as follows:

Reduction of $2,000 to $2,099 group to $2,000	$117,574
Reduction of $2,100 to $2,199 group to $2,000	9,568,924
Reduction of $2,200 to $2,299 group to $2,000	[2] 3,443,573
Reduction of $2,300 and over 10 per cent	40,192,394
Total	55,382,465

The following table shows the number of employees under $2,000 and the number at $2,000 and over for both the District of Columbia and the field service.

	Civilian, commissioned, and enlisted personnel in the executive branch of the Federal Government
	Number	Compensation
Under $2,000 per annum	681,892	$559,756,453.03
$2,000 and over per annum	341,481	755,934,014.09
Total	1,023,373	1,315,690,467.12

[1] As the highest standard salary rate in this group is $5,400, this estimate is based upon a 10 per cent reduction for all employees in the group.

[2] As the highest standard salary rate in this group is $2,200, this estimate is based upon a 10 per cent reduction for all employees in the group.

This is the same information contained in a recent letter from this bureau to Senator JONES, chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Very truly yours,

HERBERT D. BROWN, Chief.

POLISH COLONIAL PATRIOTS

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a statement of our continental Polish heroes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, the names of two great Poles will be associated with the name of George Washington and the founding of the American Republic as long as history endures. They are Thaddeus Kosciusko and Casimir Pulaski. Kosciusko was the first of that noted galaxy of foreign officers who volunteered for the cause of the Colonies. Of this noted group only Pulaski and DeKalb gave their lives in the Revolution.

Kosciusko and Pulaski, while imbued with the same ideals, differed widely in their personalities and in their military specialties. Kosciusko was a highly trained technician, while Pulaski, although regarded as a military genius, was more of the dashing type whom men would follow cheerfully to their deaths. Both men are credited at different times with saving the American cause.

The beginning of the year 1777 was a dark period for the Continental Army. The troops were ill clad, ill fed, and had suffered one defeat after another. On top of this it was learned that General Burgoyne was coming down through New York State from the north. Gen. Horatio Gates commanded the American Army of the North. Kosciusko, who had already demonstrated his ability in the fortification of Philadelphia, was connected with the Gates army as an engineer. Kosciusko recommended that a battery be placed on the summit of Sugar Loaf Hill. Unfortunately for the Colonial officers, General Gates was relieved of this command, after he had approved the Kosciusko plan of defense. His successor vetoed the plan, with disastrous results. After the commander who relieved Gates began to suspect that he had made a mistake he sent the same Colonel Wilkinson who later carried to Congress the report of the capture of Burgoyne to inspect the defenses. Wilkinson promptly wrote: "For the love of God, let Kosciusko return here, and as quickly as possible." Unfortunately, this belated recommendation of Kosciusko's plan of defense was too late. The English, already on Lake Champlain, themselves followed Kosciusko's idea.

When Gates was restored to his command he commissioned Kosciusko to devise a plan for the defense of Saratoga and to check the British advance. Kosciusko fortified Bemis Heights. The Americans crushed Burgoyne's force in the Saratoga Valley, and hope flamed anew in the hearts of the colonists. Following this victory at Saratoga, one of the decisive engagements of history, many European powers recognized the independence of the United States, even though the war had not been concluded.

Historians point to Kosciusko's part in this battle and in the preparation for it as showing his astounding worth to the American forces. A victory by Burgoyne at that time might easily have brought in its train complete defeat for the colonists and might have placed an entirely new face upon subsequent world history. General Gates eagerly acknowledged his indebtedness to Kosciusko in his official report to Congress.

Kosciusko's next task was the fortification of the heights of West Point. Radiere, described as an "impatient, petulant officer," was originally intrusted with the task. He planned it on too large a scale, accomplished little, and Kosciusko was dispatched to the scene. The young Polish military engineer made many changes in the original plans and the work was pushed rapidly, to the satisfaction of all. By 1778 Kosciusko had finished the gigantic task, and military men regarded West Point as impregnable. The importance of the fortification was that the Hudson River was the only passage by which the British could cooperate with an army from Canada, and General Washington regarded this position as indispensable. He pointed out that upon its security depended America's chief supplies of flour for the armies.

In 1780 Thaddeus Kosciusko was appointed chief engineer of the Army of the South, then commanded by Gen. Nathanael Greene. Greene found this army lacked clothing, food, and resources generally. He sent Kosciusko to select a camp site. The Polish engineer picked out a spot at the head of navigation on the Pee Dee, in fertile country unspoiled by war. There the army rested and discipline and spirits were revived.

Kosciusko retained this post until the end of the war. His duties generally were to survey the field of operations, determine sources of water and food supply, indicate strategic points of defense and attack, and devise means for rapid movement of troops and provisions. The difficulties of this assignment may be imagined when it is remembered that the army was operating in marshy regions, frequently encountering great swamps. The fighting often of necessity became guerilla warfare, and at those times, despite his rank, the brilliant young Polish engineer fought with the rest as a common soldier. Kosciusko was not a soldier of fortune by any means. He did not present himself to Washington under any assumed title, although that was frequently done at that time. He asked for no rank, demanded no pay. He was given the rank of colonel of Engineers. Washington termed him "a gentleman of science and merit."

Kosciusko's will, which he left with his friend, Thomas Jefferson, on his second and last departure from America, displayed a love of liberty extending to all peoples everywhere. While in Virginia he had seen slavery in all its phases. In his will he evidently foresaw a broader scope of human freedom in America than that for which he was himself disinterestedly battling in an alien land. The famous Kosciusko will is recorded as one of the torches lighting the path of human progress. It follows:

I, Tadeusz Kosciuszko, being just on my departure from America, do hereby declare and direct that, should I make no other testamentory disposition of my property in the United States, I hereby authorize my friend, Thomas Jefferson, to employ the whole thereof in purchasing negroes from among his own slaves, or any others, and giving them liberty in my name; in giving them an education in trade or otherwise; in having them instructed for their new condition in the duties of morality, which may make them good neighbors, good fathers and mothers, husbands and wives, in their duty as citizens, teaching them to be defenders of their liberty and country, of the good order of society, and in whatsoever may make them happy and useful; and I make the said Thomas Jefferson executor of this.

5th of May, 1798.

T. KOSCIUSZKO.

After the war closed, on the recommendation of Washington, Kosciusko was given the rank of brigadier general for "long, faithful, and honorable service." Ranking with the class of officers second only to Washington and Greene, he with others was given a tract of land where the city of Columbus, capital of Ohio, now stands. Tributes and expressions of gratitude too numerous to detail were showered upon this foreign hero. Of the many foreign officers who fought in Washington's army, Kosciusko was one of three selected as a member of the Society of Cincinnati.

Kosciusko returned to his own country and in 1794 led a revolt to try to strike the shackles of alien governments from his own people, but failed, and spent his declining years, after a second visit to America, in Switzerland.

Casimir Pulaski came to America with a record of military daring already established in Europe, although still a very young man. Before he reached his majority he was a member of the guard of Duke Charles of Curland. When the Polish throne was vacant Russian forces moved toward Warsaw and many Poles resented this means of intimidation. They found a leader in Count Joseph Pulaski, who, in 1768, organized the Confederation of Bar, whose object was to vindicate the sovereign rights of Poland. The armed forces of the confederation actively opposed the puppet King placed on the throne, but the leader of this revolt, the father of Casimir Pulaski, was betrayed by treachery and died in prison in 1769.

Young Cisimir had entered this fight at the age of 20, and on his father's death the chief command devolved upon him. The forces under Pulaski finally went down to defeat, and in 1772 Russia, Austria, and Prussia undertook the first partition of Poland.

Although he emerged defeated from this long campaign, young Casimir Pulaski had established an enviable reputation as a soldier and leader of men. Hounded from his own country by alien enemies, Pulaski sought out Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane in Paris and engaged to enter the American cause to fight for the freedom denied his own people. A year passed before arrangements could be perfected, but in June, 1777, with Lieutenant Colonel Kotkowski, another Polish patriot, he sailed for America. Franklin wrote General Washington as follows:

Count Pulaski, of Poland, an officer famous throughout Europe for his bravery and conduct in defense of liberties of his country against the three great invading powers of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, will have the honor of delivering this note to your excellency's hands.

Pulaski landed at Marblehead on July 23, 1777. When Pulaski first met Washington the fortunes of the colonists were at a low ebb. New York had been lost the previous year; a series of defeats, desertions, and lapsing of enlistments had reduced Washington's forces to a pitiful ragged handful to oppose Lord Howe's army of 30,000 thoroughly equipped and well-supplied soldiers.

Washington sent a letter introducing Count Pulaski to the Continental Congress, urging that he be given a commission. Delays held up congressional action, which did not at all suit the dashing Polish officer. Washington's army had gone to meet the enemy, so Pulaski went also, although having no official standing. Washington wrote Hancock, introducing Pulaski's plan for a mounted corps. Two weeks later, before the letter could be considered by Congress, Count Pulaski received his American baptism of fire at the Battle of Brandywine, although holding no command or commission.

Howe, at the head of 20,000 troops, was marching to capture Philadelphia. Washington drew his poorly equipped and poorly trained men, numbering half as many, across the British advance. Howe and Cornwallis flanked the Continental Army, routing one wing, and forced Washington to retreat. The absence of a mounted force had left Washington in the dark so far as reliable and prompt information of British movements was concerned. In this engagement, at a critical time, Washington gave Pulaski command of his own body guard and 30 horse. Although this was a pitifully inadequate weapon, with his small detachment Pulaski charged the oncoming British, retarded their advance, and checkmated an effort to cut off the American avenue of retreat and capture the American baggage. Four days after this Congress named Pulaski "commander of the horse, with the rank of brigadier." In short, this dashing young Polish fighter was the first American Chief of Cavalry.

Five days after the Battle of Brandywine, on September 16, 1777, Pulaski saved the army of Washington from a surprise attack that might have proven disastrous. Reconnoitering with his cavalry, he found a British army near Warren Tavern. Hastily apprising Washington of the situation, he harassed the enemy, impeding their progress sufficiently to give Washington time to complete his preparations for battle.

Pulaski saw little of the terrible winter at Valley Forge. The last day of 1777 he was ordered to Trenton to establish a camp to instruct and condition the soldiers for the next campaign. The latter part of February of the next year Pulaski with 50 men joined Gen. Anthony Wayne, who had 250 New Jersey militiamen. The combined forces, small though they were in numbers, were ordered to thwart an attack by which the British planned to secure supplies from Philadelphia. On March 3, 1778, the British were met at Haddonfield, N. J. In this encounter Pulaski's horse was shot dead under him and he personally took seven prisoners. General Wayne, reporting the battle, said that "Pulaski behaved with his usual bravery."

Pulaski was dissatisfied with the condition of the cavalry he commanded and also with the inadequate attention given his pleas for reorganization and strengthening of this arm of the service. As he also felt the lack of cooperation on the part of some of his officers who objected to a leader relatively unacquainted with English, Pulaski resigned his command in March, 1778. He then requested Washington and the Continental Congress to permit him to organize an independent force, which became famous later as the "Pulaski Legion." To the credit of the Continental Congress, it adopted a resolution retaining for Count Pulaski his rank of brigadier general and giving him the permission he desired.

The next month Pulaski opened a recruiting office in Baltimore and by July of 1778 had raised, organized, and disciplined an independent corps made up of three companies of cavalry and three of infantry. The officers were chiefly Polish and French. Pulaski's legion served as the model upon which General Lee's independent legions were organized in the following century during the Civil War. The famous banner made for his legion by the Moravian nuns is still preserved by the Maryland Historical Society of Baltimore.

Far from seeking to enhance his own fortunes at the expense of the struggling colonists, Pulaski spent a great deal of his own money in raising and equipping his own legion. Addressing Congress in September, 1778, he said he had expended at least $16,000 of his own money. This was only a few months after the independent corps began its existence. Later Captain Baldesquin, paymaster of the legion, told Congress Pulaski had spent for it at least $50,000 of his own money. In the fall of 1778 the legion took the field, its first operations being at Egg Harbor, N. J., to protect a privateer base. The infantry portion of the legion was surprised there by the British on October 15, and Lieut. Col. Baron DeBose, a Pole, was slain. Pulaski's cavalry rescued the infantry and drove back the invaders.

After further service in Minisink region in New Jersey, Pulaski, with part of his force moved south, reaching Charleston, S. C., on May 8. Three days later the remainder of the legion arrived. The same day a British force under General Provost crossed the Ashley River with 900 men and was sharply attacked by Pulaski's men. This engagement was of little importance except for the fact that this prompt and bold attack greatly raised the spirits of the people and inspired the inexperienced troops then in the city with confidence.

When the governor and council of Charleston were ready to surrender the city to the British, Pulaski, seconded by General Moultrie and Colonel Laurens, persuaded them to reject the plan and that same night General Provost retreated across the river, having learned that General Lincoln was marching toward Charleston with a force of 4,000 men.

Savannah was a British stronghold and General Lincoln intended to besiege it. Count Pulaski and General McIntosh preceded the main army to attack and harass British outposts. The siege of Savannah started September 16, with Count d'Estaing with a French fleet aiding the siege from the sea. The French commander finally requested that the city be attacked by storm, to which plan General Lincoln consented after some hesitation. Accordingly, on October 9 the order went forth that the British ramparts were to be stormed. The cavalry of the French and the Americans was commanded by Pulaski. He was to charge the embattlements and the infantry were ordered to storm the right of the British line.

The well-laid plans went wrong, due to the treachery of an American soldier who deserted after the orders were announced. Consequently enemy troops were massed at point of attack and deadly fire repulsed the assailants. Count d'Estaing tried to advance directly across a swamp, but a deadly cross fire wrought havoc among his men. Seeing the confusion and knowing that something had gone wrong with the plans, Pulaski, at the head of his cavalry, dashed to reinforce and encourage the French, at the same time hoping to find an opening through which he could slip to the rear of the British. Riding through a withering flame of enemy shells he was struck in the groin and fell to the ground mortally wounded.

The heroic Polish commander was carried away by his own soldiers, placed on the American brig Wasp under the care of skilled French surgeons. However, gangrene had set in and two days later, on October 11, 1779, he was buried at sea. When the Wasp sailed into Charleston Harbor with her flag at half mast and it became known that the gallant Pulaski was dead, the city went into general mourning. High honors were paid to the memory of the dashing cavalryman by the city, the State, and the Continental Congress.

Thus ended, at the age of 31 years, the career of a gallant soldier who had made himself a heroic figure both in America and in Europe.

On the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the siege of Savannah, October 9–11, 1929, nation-wide tribute was paid to the memory of this fighter for freedom. President Hoover and the Congress of the United States designated a committee to head the national observance of the anniversary of Pulaski's death, and cities and States from coast to coast united in paying the highest honors to the memory of this distinguished Pole who laid down his life in the cause of the American independence led by George Washington.

Statues of Count Casimir Pulaski and General Kosciusko are located in the city of Washington as follows:

Count Pulaski in Franklin Park at the intersection of E Street and Pennsylvania Avenue.

General Kosciusko in the east corner of Lafayette Square. Erected by the Polish National Alliance of America and presented on behalf of the Polish American citizens May 11, 1910.

Busts of both are also located in Statuary Hall in the Capitol in Washington.

CORRECTION IN CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, in publishing the last directory unwittingly an injustice was done the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. We have listed the gentleman from New York as coming from Brooklyn, and I understand the gentleman objects to that and says he is a citizen of New York. It was an error committed in the office, and we very gladly apologize for it and ask that all Members address the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in New York and not in Brooklyn.

INVESTIGATION OF CAUSE AND EFFECT OF DEPRESSED VALUE OF SILVER, MONETARY POLICIES OF THE UNITED STATES, ETC.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up the resolution (H. Res. 72) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 72

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the cause and effect of the present depressed value of silver, the monetary policies of the United States and foreign countries and their relation to the value of silver, methods of stabilizing the value of silver, and the advisability of an international conference to consider methods by which by international cooperation the value of silver can be stabilized. Such committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire some time under the rule?

Mr. PURNELL. I have some requests. I would like the gentleman to yield me 30 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have given assurance to the Speaker that we would limit time as much as possible on this rule. Could the gentleman not get along with 20 minutes? I hope the gentleman can do so.

Mr. PURNELL. I would be glad to get along with 15 minutes if the gentleman will help me.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to do that. I will make that agreement with the gentleman, that we will each use 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes, or so much thereof as he may desire, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS], chairman of the committee.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. House Resolution 72 directs the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to investigate the cause and effect of the present depressed value of silver, the monetary policies of the United States and foreign countries, and their relation to the value of silver, methods of stabilizing the value of silver, and the advisability of an international conference to consider methods by which, by international cooperation, the value of silver can be stabilized.

As a preface to anything which your committee may state or recommend, they desire to go on record as recognizing and adhering to the principle that no monetary system can endure which has not stood the test of time nor the sanction of the customs of the people whom it serves.

The gold standard has served the people of the United States from the late seventies upon the resumption of the specie payments by our Treasury up to the present time. Until quite recently it performed similar service for all the nations of the western world and may, therefore, be said to have merited the sanction which only custom could give it. Having accepted this principle, the committee conclude that their efforts should be entirely directed toward finding a solution for their problem which shall preserve for the people of the United States the integrity of the gold standard because that system seems best suited to their habits and to their customs.

The committee believe that the foregoing principle of reasoning if applicable to the American monetary system in its relation to the people of this country can, in all propriety, and should, in all fairness, be applied to other monetary systems of the world in their relations to the habits and customs of the citizens of these other nations.

The price of silver, or of any other commodity, responds to the natural law of supply and demand with the distinction that, unlike any other commodity excepting gold, silver serves a dual purpose in that it is both a commodity and a yardstick of value, and, while not our yardstick, certainly that of untold millions of human beings in many parts of the world who are the direct or indirect customers of the people of the United States of America. It is the task of the committee to determine the causes of the fall in the price of silver in the face of the reduced production, as well as to inquire into the rise in the price of gold, when measured in terms of all commodities, including labor. This rise has come about despite the substantial production and the continuous increase of visible stocks. After having ascertained the foregoing, the committee will endeavor to analyze the effects of these paradoxical phenomena upon the monetary systems of the world, and, through these, their influence upon the trade of the world. Once causes and effects are known and the accurate diagnosis established, it is the committee's conviction that the remedy will logically suggest itself.

History shows that the monetary policy of any country, of the United States as well as of foreign countries, is subject to alteration, voluntary or otherwise, in accordance with changed economic conditions. While the committee can not recommend that suggestions be advanced to other nations which would effectually alter their monetary policies to suit our convenience, they nevertheless feel that other nations can be approached in all propriety with such suggestions as are based on the broader aspect of the situation if examination reveals the nature of our problems as being identical with their own.

After analysis of the subject the committee will make such recommendations as they deem advisable, bearing in mind the international aspects of the question, because gold and silver are recognized the world over as yardsticks of value, stores of wealth, and those instruments which are utilized for the discharge of international obligations, either when credit is unnecessary or when it fails for the purpose, or when the machinery of credit is nonexistent as is the case in certain parts of the world. Such conditions, if existent, are a challenge to international cooperation, so that if the examination reveals them, the committee will most certainly recommend the shortest path to cooperation by conference or otherwise.

The committee further believes that the solution of the fundamental problem of money is at the very root of our present evils, so that its correction necessarily implies progress in the solving of other important questions, the discussion of which in the absence of stable monetary conditions becomes futile and academic. As a matter of fact, the committee points out that it may be understood both at home and abroad that if monetary instability has destroyed trade, and with it capacity to pay, it has also destroyed in the same degree our ability to cancel. It therefore follows, as naturally as day follows night, that stability of money should restore trade, thus re-creating capacity to pay and likewise our ability to cancel. Under such conditions the common burden might possibly be borne by all, because cooperative effort will have made it lighter, whereas, under present conditions, it is too heavy to be carried alone, so that danger threatens creditor and debtor nations alike.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We observe from a reading of the last paragraph of the resolution that there is no limitation or suggestion of limitation placed upon the amount that the committee will ask under this appropriation. The gentleman from New York in presenting this rule to the Committee on Rules, gave us the assurance, the most modest one I have ever heard, where an investigation was asked, that they would not ask for more than $5,000 total to be used in this investigation. I would like to have the gentleman from New York confirm that statement.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. It is my belief that no more than $5,000 will be necessary for this investigation, and it is my intention to ask for no more.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. PURNELL. I wanted to confirm what the gentleman from Alabama said, and also express the hope that this resolution may be amended so as to provide that. I realize the gentleman has made the statement before the committee in utmost good faith, but the gentleman must recognize that these things often get away from even the chairman and the minority and the majority members of the committee.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I realize that, and I have no objection whatever to amending the resolution at the present time to limit it to that amount.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It was along that line that I wished to propound an inquiry to the gentleman having the bill in charge. I realize the futility of opposing such measures as this. If they are to be opposed, they should be opposed at the present time, but there is never anyone ready to take the floor in opposition to them. I certainly should feel it a part of my duty to oppose the resolution unless a specific amount were stated and the House was allowed to understand and know in the first place just how much it would cost. Of course, in the past it has been shown that these investigations lead to nothing and accomplish little or nothing, but that has no effect upon the Members of Congress. I do think that before this resolution is passed, we should have definitely stated the amount they intend to ask and the amount which would be the limit, so that they will not come in later for an additional amount. If nobody else offers the amendment, I will offer an amendment that this be limited to $5,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] is doing a good service as the watchdog of the Treasury. The gentleman states that these investigations amount to nothing and reach nowhere. I would inform the gentleman that we have had very few investigations in the House of Representatives. Every investigation ought to be conducted by the House of Representatives instead of by the other body. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that while other investigations may have come to naught, as the gentleman says, yet the gentleman has never witnessed an investigation by such a committee as we have now in charge of coinage, weights, and measures. [Applause.] I regard the chairman of this committee as the best-posted man with whom I have had any conversation on the subject of silver. [Applause.] I am not going to be a member of this investigating committee, so I may speak unselfishly. I hope the expense will not be limited. This is the most important problem before the American people to-day in the direction of curing the ills of our own governmental financial system.

I hope the committee will be given wide leverage and plenty of money to secure an investigation which will mean something. [Applause.]

Mr. SOMERS of New York. May I say to the gentleman from Nebraska that that compliment, coming from him, is one that is going to linger long in my memory. I can not conceive of a finer tribute paid to any man. I wish I deserved it. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON]. [Applause.]

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to add thereto a circulation statement of United States money, December 31, 1931.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, once more I want to talk to you about silver. This time in support of H. Res. 72, which I trust will pass without a dissenting vote.

Since I spoke the first time in this Seventy-second Congress on the subject of silver it seems as if all the old stories, the old prejudices, and the old arguments have been revived. Just yesterday I was reminded of that old story of the gold monometallist who, looking at a silver dollar, said to the bimetallist, "It's good you have those words on there, 'In God we trust.' Would that you might also have engraven these words on all coins so that it could be believed by all, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'"

And that little note of confidence is what is being shown here this morning, at least to the extent of authorizing the Coins, Weights, and Measures Committee to investigate the cause and effect of:

First. The present depressed price of silver.

Second. The monetary policies of the United States and foreign countries and their relation to the value of silver.

Third. Methods of stabilizing the value of silver; and Fourth. Advisability of an international conference to consider methods by which international cooperation, the value of silver, can be stabilized.

Just as an indication of what that committee has before it, let me mention to you some of the remedies which have been suggested during the month of January, 1932. I do not mean that any one of these was first suggested in that month, but each one of those I mention, and others, has been discussed in my hearing since Christmas.

CHECKS

When that committee delves into the monetary policies of the United States, it will have to consider the effect of the checking system of this country which is so universally used to make available our bank deposits. Statistics may be seen which demonstrate that during the peak year of 1929 the bank deposits of New York City turned over every other day—more than 160 times during the year. Throughout the whole United States the bank deposits of the cities of the United States turned over during 1930 oftener than once a week, and for the time in 1931 for which figures are available, the turnover was only 10 per cent less.

The figures of our money turnover are stupendous. A few days ago the Ways and Means Committee were told that the annual manufacturing business of the United States amounted to $60,000,000,000, and the speaker attempted to demonstrate how a very small tax rate on that amount would produce a large revenue. A statistician tells us that the annual check turnover of money was eleven times greater than the money produced from business in 1930. He says: "In 1930 over six hundred and sixty-two billions of money duty was obtained from the use of checks."

What change has the checking system made in the monetary system of the United States since the demonitization of silver?

A LIMITED COINAGE OF SILVER AT A FLEXIBLE RATIO OF SILVER TO GOLD

A limited coinage of silver at a flexible ratio of silver to gold is one plan. This means a present adjustment of the existing stocks of silver to gold, the proportion to be designated, and thereafter silver and gold to be augmented in an adjustable quantity to maintain the proportion of weight of metal and value thereof.

When it is pointed out that the proportion of production of gold and silver since Columbus discovered the New World is about 13½ to 1 in weight, that the proportion of gold and silver actually used in our own money system is said to be about 5 to 1 in dollars, and that the present annual production is approximately 10 to 1 by weight, the difficulty of starting a properly adjusted basis is at once apparent.

However, one of these plans is premised upon a general principle that our currency should rest upon a 50 per cent metal base; that is, that the total paper money should not be more than double the amount of metal, and that the metal basis should be double—that is, bimetallic—gold and silver. Of this bimetallic base there should be a constant of one-half gold, the other half to be a variable of gold and silver, containing a minimum of one-fourth of the half, or one-eighth, and the balance of three-fourths of the half, or three-eighths, optionally, gold and silver in any proportion.

If silver is not on a fixed ratio of weight to gold, but is figured at its market value for defined periods, measured by the gold standard, the number of ounces of silver required to balance the currency would rise and fall automatically, adjusting the market price of silver and the quantity in the currency, thus, it is said, making an automatic peg of the price of silver.

On the basis of the December 31, 1931, circulation of United States money, would not this plan work out in this way?

We had on hand $4,460,099,079 in gold and $848,271,510 in silver bullion, coined dollars, and subsidiary silver coins. The proportion proposed would require $281,778,030 more silver to bring it up to one-fourth of the gold, or $1,130,049,540. I am talking now about dollars, not ounces of gold or silver, because the circulation statement mentions only dollars for gold, silver, and paper money. This additional silver is, in round figures, $300,000,000. I have not learned whether the proponents of this plan have considered the statement which I made to you in this House last month that there were $308,628,269 in silver dollars and $268,063,510.80 in subsidiary silver coins unaccounted for in our circulation. It may be merely a coincidence, but it is worthy of careful study to determine whether the currency of this country ought not to be balanced by purchasing approximately $300,000,000 in silver, and to decide whether that figure ought to designate ounces of silver on the present buying power of gold converted into silver at the prevailing market price; or coin the silver into dollars or to hold the bullion and merely issue paper certificates therefor.

Our total circulation of all kinds of money—gold, silver, minor coins, and paper—amounted to $9,421,224,505. On the proposed basis we would be entitled to have a total currency of $10,616,741,198 upon our present holding of the metals—gold and silver. This is $1,195,516,693 more than is now in circulation. But if it is wise to keep the paper money down to its proportion of 40 per cent of the total currency, will you agree that the economic structure will remain sound if we increase our metal base by putting into it the silver to balance this theory? If you answer "yes," then you may increase our currency with the minimum amount of inflation, and it is an open question whether it would amount to any more inflation than there is in our currency at the present time when compared with its metal foundation.

Here is the "Circulation Statement of United States Money," as issued by the Treasury Department as of date, December 31, 1931:

[1] Includes money held by the Cuban agency of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta.

[2] The money in circulation includes any paper currency held outside the continental limits of the United States.

[3] Does not include gold bullion or foreign coin other than that held by the Treasury, Federal reserve banks, and Federal reserve agents. Gold held by Federal reserve banks under earmark for foreign account is excluded, and gold held abroad for Federal reserve banks is included.

[4] These amounts are not included in the total, since the money held in trust against gold and silver certificates and Treasury notes of 1890 is included under gold coin and bullion and standard silver dollars, respectively.

[5] The amount of money held in trust against gold and silver certificates and Treasury notes of 1890 should be deducted from this total before combining it with total money outside of the Treasury to arrive at the stock of money in the United States.

[6] This total includes $55,466,536 gold deposited for the redemption of Federal reserve notes ($503,280 in process of redemption), $28,667,622 lawful money deposited for the redemption of national-bank notes ($17,040,235 in process of redemption, including notes chargeable to the retirement fund), $1,350 lawful money deposited for the retirement of additional circulation (act of May 30, 1908), and $16,155,207 lawful money deposited as a reserve for postal-savings deposits.

NOTE.—Gold certificates are secured, dollar for dollar, by gold held in the Treasury for their redemption; silver certificates are secured, dollar for dollar, by standard silver dollars held in the Treasury for their redemption; United States notes are secured by a gold reserve of $156,039,088 held in the Treasury. This reserve fund may also be used for the redemption of Treasury notes of 1890, which are also secured, dollar for dollar, by standard silver dollars held in the Treasury; these notes are being canceled and retired on receipt. Federal reserve notes are obligations of the United States and a first lien on all the assets of the issuing Federal reserve bank. Federal reserve notes are secured by the deposit with Federal reserve agents of a like amount of gold or gold and such discounted or purchased paper as is eligible under the terms of the Federal reserve act. Federal reserve banks must maintain a gold reserve of at least 40 per cent, including the gold redemption fund which must be deposited with the United States Treasurer against Federal reserve notes in actual circulation. Lawful money has been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for retirement of all outstanding Federal reserve bank notes. National bank notes are secured by United States bonds except where lawful money has been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for their retirement. A 5 per cent fund is also maintained in lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States for the redemption of national-bank notes secured by Government bonds.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. If the foregoing sounds involved, I will not take the time this moment to straighten it out. Suffice it to say that there is also required in this plan that withdrawal of gold shall be protected, and to that end each dollar of paper currency should be redeemable in the stated proportions of gold and silver in the metal reserve at the time of redemption.

NEW COINS WITH A DIFFERENT STATUS THAN THE PRESENT ISSUE

New coins, with a different status than the present issued, are an adaptation of an Englishman's idea of new international interchangeable silver money and are the subject of a pending bill. It provides for the handling of silver at the mint and the issuance therefor of silver certificates payable in ounces of silver instead of dollars.

A variation of this idea is proposed by one who suggests a half-billion-dollar international corporation, which will be vested with the power of buying silver, issuing paper certificates therefor, having an interchangeable value between the countries interested, just like travelers' checks. This would involve the designation of a place of deposit of the silver which would be satisfactory to all nations concerned.

CHANGING VALUE OF GOLD PLAN

Changing value of gold plan is the subject of a pending bill which proposes to change the present standard in weight of the gold dollar, which to-day is 23.22 grains, pure gold, by reducing it approximately one-fourth, thus making the standard gold dollar approximately 17.42 grains of the same fineness.

It is apparent that the immediate effect of such a proposal would be to immediately inflate the value of the existing gold approximately one-third, so that the existing gold in the Treasury, measured by such a new basis, instead of being four billion and odd dollars, would be six billion and odd dollars.

This bill further provides for regulation of the weight of the gold dollar by the gage of its average buying power and a plan for determining the same.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER AT A RATIO OF 16 TO 1

Free coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, means silver as a legal tender for all purposes and interchangeable with gold at the ratio. The bankers, international and otherwise, resist this idea. They own and hold the obligations payable in gold. The representatives of two nation-wide farmers' organizations unequivocally support the idea and point out that if the elements of economics as stated by the bankers are true, than neither farming nor any other industry of the world can pay itself out of its present debts. Bankruptcy, general in character, will have to be invoked to settle the private debts. Repudiation and the disagreeable features incident to such action will have to be used by nations to dispose of the international as well as the internal public debts.

They point out that the price of silver follows or accompanies the prices of commodities up and down.

The inadequacy of the amount of existing gold for money purposes is accentuated.

The continual annual decline of adequate gold production is a fact which is predicted to continue.

The necessity for now retracing the steps taken in 1873 and 1893 and making a solid bimetallic base for our money at a definite ratio of 16 to 1 in place of the present inadequate gold base is fully believed and supported by these farmers' organizations, by miners, and a host of others, organized and unorganized—and they are not confined to the United States.

CHANGING LEGAL-TENDER PLAN

Changing legal-tender plan is the subject of one pending bill which provides that hereafter all debts shall be payable in lawful money of the United States and not in any specified weight of gold, and declaring unlawful and void any contract or agreement hereafter made specifying the weight and fineness of gold in which it shall be paid.

A variation of this plan is retroactive in effect and provides that silver shall have unlimited monetary privileges in all transactions for which settlements were previously made or required to be made in gold. In this suggestion it is proposed that the ratio of silver to gold shall be immediately set at 1 to 50, to continue for the first five years. To-day's ratio in value is approximately 1 to 70, I believe.

For the next succeeding 20 years the ratio shall be gradually reduced until it reaches 25 to 1, or possibly 20 to 1. It is suggested that this plan be concurred in by the principal silver-producing countries—United States, Canada, Mexico, and Peru—and if so agreed, that this would automatically establish a value for the world which would prevail as the proportion diminished.

It is pointed out in connection with this plan that, while much is said about obligations payable in gold of the standard weight and fineness, outside of governmental debts and many corporate bond issues, many, if not most, debts now in existence in the United States have no such specific contractual obligation. It is significant that when we were informed by the press of the country upon September 21, 1931, that England had gone off the gold standard the truth was that England excepted from its edict certain governmental and other obligations which specifically required payment in gold of a certain weight and fineness, and applied the edict to all others, thus classifying the debts incurred without special reference to gold as being payable according to the new rule.

UNLIMITED POWER OF PURCHASE AND STORAGE INSTEAD OF UNLIMITED PURCHASE AND COINAGE

Unlimited power of purchase and storage instead of unlimited purchase and coinage is a plan providing that paper certificates shall be issued against the silver in storage without requiring that any part of it be stamped out of the silver bars as coins.

This variation of the free and unlimited coinage of silver has its serious advocates who insist that this is the remedy which must finally be adopted, and until it is that there will continue to be financial disturbances as long as this country recognizes any metallic base for its money system. I believe it is called by some the "silver asset" plan.

THE WAR-DEBT PAYMENT PLAN

Another proposal is that the war debt of the United States be paid in silver. It involves many questions besides the simple one of payment. Where would the paying nations get the silver? How much money is involved? How much silver?

We now use nearly a billion dollars in designated silver in our currency, either as coins or in paper dollars. There are over $10,000,000,000 to be paid. The annual payment covered by the moratorium is about a quarter of a billion dollars.

If we took payment in silver, what would we do with it?

MORE USES FOR SILVER

Some advocate finding more uses for silver for commercial purposes. Some the use of more silver dollars. One proposal is to reduce the size of both the silver dollar and half dollars in an attempt to popularize their use. Another proposal is to make new coins of part silver and part gold.

There was a proposal that the United States buy 200,000,000 ounces of silver bullion and lend it to the Chinese Government.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE

It is said that by international conference the Indian rupee may be restored to a pre-war basis; Great Britain, France, and Mexico may restore the fineness of silver coins to the pre-war basis; all countries off the gold standard may increase their circulation by new silver coinage—and the continued menace of the sale of silver surplus by India may be removed.

Further, that the production of silver may be restricted by agreement between the silver-producing countries—United States, Canada, Mexico, and Peru.

CONCLUSION

In mentioning these suggestions I do not want anyone to feel abused because I have not spoken of his pet theory. There is not time.

But it is significant that in the explanation of every scheme it appears that the use of silver as money in the United States has practically ceased except for subsidiary money and as a reserve for the issuance of paper dollar bills.

Some say this is not a money panic. I am told that if it were necessary the Federal reserve bank could properly issue $3,000,000,000 more of Federal reserve notes; that it has on hand enough gold and eligible paper to increase the paper money of the country $3,000,000,000. There are some who say that it is not metal or paper currency which the country needs in this financial crisis. Others unreservedly and without hesitation state that it is necessary to inflate our currency at the present time.

To increase the circulating medium owned and issued by the Government and to inflate the currency do not mean the same thing to me, but it is certainly true that bankers, publicists, business men, economists, farmers, and all classes are concerned with the question of balancing the purchasing power of the currency we are using. And they and every one of us know that we are in the same shape as the bank whose customers start a run. If called upon for payment, the bank can only pay a part of its entire deposits. If all payments upon delinquent debts required to be made in gold were called, there is not enough gold to make them.

And whether the condition resulting will be a general bankruptcy or whether it results in inflation of currency or repudiation of debts, the net results will be the same. As the adjustments are made, at least a part of the losses caused by the changed buying power of commodities, as well as silver, must be borne by the money lenders and those to whom they have passed on the loans.

The more I hear the subject discussed the more am I coming to believe that the way out is to increase our currency by adding more silver in the base; but whether this is done by the purchase of silver with gold, on a 16-to-1 or some other basis, or the issuance of silver certificates or the required use of silver dollars as a working part of our currency, or a moratorium on payments in gold as was ordered by England, is a conclusion I have reserved until those who have also studied the question present their views at the hearings provided for by the resolution.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ].

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, the senior Senator from Nevada, Senator KEY PITTMAN, last year introduced a resolution calling for an international conference. Since that time both Senator PITTMAN, Senator ODDIE, and myself have been pushing such an idea. If an international conference is called and our delegates go abroad without a plan or without any suggestion from the Congress of the United States, what will they do? They are going to be dealt with in the same manner that every American conference that has gone abroad has been treated. They are going to be jockeyed around by the foreign delegates, and either something done to satisfy those countries or nothing will be done. I am sure if a plan for the stabilization of silver satisfactory to the Congress of the United States is ultimately adopted it is reasonable to suppose we would be more apt to reach that consummation if our delegates have some plan to propose.

Now, what does this resolution do? This resolution provides for a thorough investigation of all phases of the silver question. To us men here in contact with our constituents, every day we are receiving word to the effect that commodity prices are low; that commodity prices are such that they can not pay their debts. Where a dollar represented a bushel of wheat or even less than that a few years ago, to-day it represents 2 or 3 bushels, so that the farmer, instead of paying his debts under conditions such as exist to-day, desires something to be done about the stabilization of commodity prices. The same statement holds true of the mine operator, the lumberman, the sheepman, the cattleman, and the manufacturer.

It is rather remarkable and significant, in looking back over the history of our monetary conferences both here and abroad, that they have always occurred when commodity prices were low, and I may say for the benefit of the membership of this House that everything that has been done to silver in the past 125 or 130 years has been artificially accomplished. In other words, it has been accomplished by the legislatures or by edict of some foreign country or by legislation of our Congress. It has not been the result of any natural condition. In each case silver has received its deathblow little by little for the last 130 years because of the avarice of men who control gold, without any thought for the man who works in the field or in the factory. They were interested in the monetary questions solely on the basis of how it would benefit them without regard as to how adversely it would affect the rest of the world.

Oh, I wish I had the time to read to you extracts from Government records that I have picked up here, there, and everywhere, dealing with the viewpoint of the banker with regard to the way he looks on gold, his control of same, and through such control the economic enslavement of the masses. I can not interpret England's policy in India, adopted in 1926, as meaning anything else than this. The subject of silver touches the whole world; its depreciation has thrown the world into chaos.

But all this aside, what we are interested in is stability of commodity prices, and it is my firm conviction you can not have stability of commodity prices unless you do something with respect to international money. We have half the world using silver and half the world using gold, with most of this one-half at the present time off the gold standard. We know there are 800,000,000 people in the world who use silver. We know that added to this number at the present time are all those nations that are off the gold standard.

Now, is it not within our right, is it not a sensible thing, to investigate silver to determine whether or not we can reach an agreement with the nations of the world to agree upon an international viewpoint regarding silver? I think it is. I think we can accomplish this; and if we can accomplish this through this hearing that is to be held on all phases of the silver question it will be worth to the world a thousand thousand times what this investigation will cost. If it results in something tangible being accomplished and that something is placed in the hands of our delegates, if we do call an international conference, then we can go abroad and accomplish some good.

I may say that if I had the power to-day I would not only direct, I would force, the President of the United States to call an international conference, because I think it is one of the most important things before the American people to-day. [Applause.] When this investigation is completed I feel sure that a plan will be proposed meeting the approval of not only the Congress but of our President. When this happy day arrives we will have made the most important step toward the prevention of great depression through which we are now passing and the early resumption of normal international trade and resulting world-wide prosperity.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, of all times this is the most inopportune for the advocates of bimetallism to revive the issues of the campaign of 1896.

When Great Britain suspended payments in gold it was necessary for our Government representatives abroad to give assurance to the world that we were not going off of the gold basis.

Gold monometallism as the standard has not failed. This is but an endeavor of the silver-mining States to sell something that has no value whatsoever or to increase the intrinsic value. It is a revival of the old campaign of the Boy Orator from the Platte to try a panacea for depressed prices and to give value to something that has no value.

With 499,000,000 of silver dollars coined, 489,000,000 are represented by silver certificates that are in circulation, and these certificates other than the fractional depreciated value of the silver dollar, about 20 cents, have nothing back of them than the promise of the Government.

The value to-day of silver is on a ratio, not of 16 to 1, as the silver-tongued orator of the Platte attempted to have this country adopt, but of about 30 to 1. We went through that issue and the country decided that gold should be the standard. With the United States having vast quantities of gold and it having been proved in these times of depression that the gold standard has not failed, I say to attempt to do something by legislation now, in these delicate financial times, to cause fear and suspicion that the great United States is going off the gold standard is most ill-advised, and I shall vote against the resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON].

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, coming from one of the largest silver-producing States in the Union, let me say in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is no request or desire on the part of the people interested in silver to revive the old bimetallic issue of 16 to 1. While we do deeply appreciate the very splendid service the gentleman from New York is rendering in asking for an investigation, the movement is not primarily a silver one. The movement is born of a desire to help the world, and this country in particular.

It came, and is coming, as the result of a careful study on the part of men who are trying to work out some sensible solution of the economic situation that confronts the world to-day.

If you go back over the history of this country, you will find that after all the main thing that has brought the country out of the economic depressions of the past has been the discovery of gold in new fields, thereby replenishing the supply of money. The added supply of money has always aided restoring prosperity.

I venture the prediction that there will be no permanent solution of this problem until we have a more sound and a more elastic monetary system in the United States. It may be that again somewhere we shall find more gold, although all lands of the world have been pretty well prospected. We find ourselves with constantly increasing business, constantly increasing and expanding commerce, with a very limited supply of basic money as a medium of exchange. It does not take an economist to see that something is wrong.

We have something like eleven billions of gold in the world to carry on the business of the entire world. It is entirely insufficient. A supplemental supply of basic money must be found. The reserves must be decreased or supplemented by some money in addition to the gold.

We know that our business has fallen off in these United States. I believe there is a direct relationship in the decline of silver and the reduction in commerce. How is it that from China the other day an order was sent over here for a $50 typewriter and it was found on investigation that the person who ordered it would have to pay $200 on the basis of the price of silver? The price of silver then was about 26 cents an ounce. There must be some relation—there is some relation between the silver supply and the use of money—gold and silver—and this entire economic situation. We should make a careful investigation of what that relationship is. I am sure we shall find that when silver prices are low commodity prices are low.

For one, coming from a silver-producing State, I want to again voice my appreciation for the work of the men who are willing to take up and give this subject careful study and investigation. I predict great good will come from this movement. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the House will consider and pass this resolution for this investigation. I regret that my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] attempted to discuss it from the standpoint of politics, because certainly there is no politics in this resolution for investigation.

There will be legislation at some future time, either in this or the next Congress, considered to give silver a place in our monetary system.

The international system is very complicated. Many nations formerly on single gold standard have dirfted away from that.

Great debtor nations of the United States are on a silver basis. Nations to which we export figure their values in silver, and it makes it very complicated from the standpoint of an exporter and complicates the collection of debts owing us by nations abroad.

An editorial in the Star of yesterday was headed "A Billion and a Half of Dollars Is in Hoarding." The per capita circulation in the United States in normal times is none too large. At this time we have reason to think it has been reduced as much as one-third, and a billion and a half dollars, assuming the premise of the editorial to be correct, means about $10 per capita. To reduce the circulation $10 per capita is detrimental. I for one believe that one of the best things that could be done to relieve the economic situation in this country would be to have a well-ordered inflation of our currency. We can not have a well-ordered per capita increase in our circulation unless we have some basis for it, and I think the silver in our country offers an opportunity for this well-ordered increase rather than to undertake to do it upon the credit of the Government without having gold or silver behind it. The world situation is very complicated. The situation in our own country is such that we can at least look into this thing in a courageous and in a practical way. This can be done by one of the leading committees of the House in order that we may better understand the situation. The situation is vastly different from what it was 30 years ago, when, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] said, Mr. Bryan made his race. Many countries have gone off the gold standard. We can not alone expect to dictate the standards of the world when we are a creditor and an exporting nation. When this international conference comes we ought to have this information so that we may deal with it in a scientific and practical manner. I join with my colleague from Nebraska in saying that we have a committee of this House with a chairman that has ability and an unbiased interest to go into this question to get the information on which to legislate. I trust the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FIXING THE TIME OF ASSEMBLING OF CONGRESS

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 133

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 14, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed three hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, the Senate joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and the amendment thereto to final passage without intervening action except one motion to recommit.

TESTIMONY OF ASSESSOR IN CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 9, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. This is District day. The gentleman from Maryland calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any action for the condemnation of lands in the District of Columbia the assessor of the District shall not be disqualified, by reason of the fact that he holds the office of assessor, from testifying as an expert witness to the market value of such lands and as to benefits.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the gentleman from Maryland relinquished the floor, and is the matter now open to debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to one hour. Of course, if he should not move the previous question, any other gentleman getting the floor would likewise have an hour. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I shall take five minutes. This is a bill to permit the District assessor in the District of Columbia to testify in court in cases of condemnation. Some time ago the assessor testified in a case in which the jury brought in a verdict of $105,000 for some property within the District. The case was taken to the supreme court, and the supreme court ruled that the assessor was disqualified to testify as an expert.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is but one point bothering me. Will this permit the assessor to testify against the Government?

Mr. PALMISANO. This will permit the assessor to testify. I would not say that he would be against the Government. He would be there more or less in behalf of the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Could he testify as an expert on valuations when the Government is condemning property and testify against the Government?

Mr. KELLER. He could testify to the truth.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As an expert, he does not testify as to facts. His testimony is opinion evidence. I am inquiring whether the bill is broad enough to permit an employee of the District of Columbia, the assessor, to testify as an expert for property owners against the Government.

Mr. PALMISANO. While the bill does not specifically state, it would give him the right to do so, but it seems to me that as an employee of the District of Columbia he would not testify against the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I should think not, but I have had it happen to me in New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. This legislation is intended and has been introduced to overcome an adverse decision of the appellate division of the supreme court.

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes. The supreme court held that the assessor was disqualified to testify. In the first trial, when he testified, a verdict was brought in for $105,000. Subsequently the case was tried again, and a verdict of $295,000 was rendered for that same property without the testimony of the assessor, and the District refused to take the property.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. Of course, these procedings are conducted by a justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, who is assigned by the chief justice?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is correct.

Mr. BOYLAN. And the jury is chosen in the regular way and the procedure of the supreme court is adopted in trying these cases. Is that not true?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is true.

Mr. BOYLAN. Then by the passage of this bill we would qualify an employee of the District of Columbia to testify as an expert, whether or not under the rules of the court he was able to qualify as an expert, in a case in which the District government is a party to the condemnation case. Is that not true?

Mr. PALMISANO. This gives him the right to qualify as a witness.

Mr. BOYLAN. Exactly. Now, I would like to call the attention of the lawyers of this House to the fact that by the passage of this bill we are making a man competent to give legal testimony who otherwise would not be competent to give such testimony. In other words, we make an expert by legislation instead of by the expert qualifying himself.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not agree with the gentleman from New York that the assessor would be made competent to testify by this law. He would perhaps be an expert in all cases before the court, but it seems to me the object of the bill is to permit him to testify in cases where the District is interested.

Mr. BOYLAN. That is the point I make. The District of Columbia is a party to the condemnation case, and the District brings one of its own employees to bolster up its own case. What chance has the ordinary citizen against a combination of that kind?

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. The District assessor makes a valuation on a piece of property. Under the laws that exist now he can not come into court and testify as to the valuation he has made. Is that right?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is right.

Mr. FIESINGER. But under this law the District assessor may come in and testify as to the value he has placed upon a particular piece of property against the owner of the piece of property, who may give a value much less than the amount fixed by the District assessor? That is the object and purpose of this bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. In a condemnation case in the District of Columbia who and how many experts have been called in those cases to testify for the Government and for the property owners? Do they usually have more than one expert on those trials?

Mr. PALMISANO. I assume they have. Of course, I am not familiar with the details.

Mr. PARSONS. And using the assessor in cases that might arise in the future, nothing contained therein, of course, would bar the Government or the property owner from subpœnaing and having qualified as experts other men who might be presumed to know values?

Mr. PALMISANO. There is no question but that in the case of condemnation proceedings the Government, as well as the individual, may employ experts in addition to this employee. It seems to me that a man who is an assessor, if a man familiar with properties in the District of Columbia and an employee of the District of Columbia, certainly ought to be able to tell the jurors just what he observes and the value he places on that property. That is all this bill permits.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. As I understand, this bill comes from the gentleman's committee, and it is the opinion of the gentleman's committee that this bill is a step toward preventing the holdups that the Government has been forced to go through in condemnation proceedings since time began with the Government. Is that true?

Mr. PALMISANO. There is no question about it. It shows that the people of the District of Columbia consider the value of this assessor's testimony, when they gave a verdict of $105,000 with his testimony, and then without his testimony they gave a verdict of $295,000. The District of Columbia was compelled to abandon that property because of the excess in value.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. We had that holdup with the National Aboretum, where we started with a high and holy purpose of buying this magnificent site, and the very first proposition we ran up against was the holdup of a lot of these real-estate brigands in Washington, to defeat the purpose of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is nothing in this bill to be construed as being the intent of Congress that the bill is permissive of permitting the assessor to be retained by outside interests to testify as an expert against the Government. Is that not true?

Mr. PALMISANO. There is nothing here that gives that permission.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And if the assessor would do that, in all likelihood he would be discharged, and should be discharged.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield me some time on this matter?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes. I will later.

This bill merely gives him the right to testify. It does not disqualify him because of the mere fact that he is an employee of the District of Columbia. That is all that is provided by this bill. I presume that the assessor himself, if he were not in the employ of the District of Columbia, would be qualified as an expert. This bill merely permits him to testify for the District of Columbia in the event the District of Columbia desires to use him.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks, as the gentleman says, to lift the ban that is now laid upon the assessor of the District of Columbia in testifying in condemnation proceedings as to values. The decision cited in the report shows that the assessor was barred from giving his testimony as to value because upon cross-examination he would certainly be obliged to refer to the assessed value, and the trial judge stated that it was not competent to bring into the trial of the case the assessed value of the property.

I might have doubts as to whether I would favor such a measure in my home city or other cities, but here in the District, where it is proverbial that the Government has been held up in nearly every instance, I certainly favor the policy of bringing relief to the Government by allowing the assessor, who would be a competent and qualified witness, to testify as to the value of the land. In the report the District commissioner calls attention to the fact that naturally the assessor is one of the best-posted men as to values. His assessment must necessarily be based upon recent sales of real estate, and he has those sales as a basis for his opinion as to present values.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] raises the question as to whether or not the assessor might be called upon to testify against the Government as to property values, but I can not conceive how any public-spirited servant of the District would do otherwise, when called upon as an expert, than to give his honest opinion as to the value of a property.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman is a distinguished and able lawyer and is one of the hardest workers on the floor of this House, yet he has condemned his own argument. He has said he would not favor this for his own home city.

Mr. STAFFORD. I said I might not favor it for my own home city.

Mr. BOYLAN. But he would favor it as against the downtrodden people of the District, who have not a friend in the world.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; they have.

Mr. BOYLAN. According to the gentleman's own statement, he is perfectly willing to inflict this on the dog, which is here represented by the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; not at all. We have this condition confronting us: The commissioner says that they spend a large amount for expert testimony and that that can be avoided by using the assessor in testifying as to the value of property. The assessor is better acquainted with the value of property here than any other person in the District and his would be better expert testimony. The only trouble is that in his examination he might be obliged to refer to the assessed value; but even if that be necessary, why should not that fact be called to the attention of the condemnation jury?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. It is stated by the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia that—

It is widely recognized that appraisements by the tax assessors for purposes of taxation are not admissible in evidence in condemnation proceedings.

Does the gentleman approve of this position, that the assessor's valuations, on which taxpayers actually pay their taxes, should be excluded as evidence in the consideration of the value of a piece of land? Does it not seem to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this ought to be quite convincing evidence as to the true value of the land? If the value has been fixed by the assessor under his official oath at so much it ought to be admissible as evidence of the real value of the land, it seems to me, yet it appears that such evidence is excluded and the assessor himself disqualified as a witness in condemnation proceedings.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would certainly be willing in my own home city to accept the assessed value, because there the assessment is based upon the present value of the property; and under the present conditions, where values have gone down, the assessment has been reduced to conform to present-day values. So it seems to me there is no reason whatsoever why the assessed values should not be taken into consideration as as evidential fact.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I am only interested in this bill as a Member of the Congress in seeing that equal and exact justice is done. It appears, and has been stated several times this afternoon, that Members favor this measure because it applies to the District of Columbia. Let us go back and find out who conducts these proceedings. They are not conducted by a commission appointed by the supreme court, as is the case in many of the States. The case is actually heard before a justice of the supreme court, who has been designated to sit in that part of the court by the chief justice of the supreme court. Surely we have confidence in the members of this court. Some of them are former Members of this body and of the body at the other side of the Capitol. They are all men of high reputation and character, so any criticism that is made as to the procedure followed therefore enters into the procedure of the Supreme Court of the District.

What does this bill propose to do? The report says:

The object of this bill is clearly stated in the title.

The title reads:

Respecting the qualifications of the assessor of the District of Columbia to testify in condemnation proceedings.

Then the report continues:

The necessity for legislation arises through the fact that the District Court of Appeals, in a recent action for condemnation of land for public use, held the assessor disqualified as an expert witness on land values because of his connection with the District government.

You lawyers will recognize your disadvantage if you go into a case against municipalities where by legislation an employee of the municipality is permitted to qualify as an expert witness. In your own States, cities, and towns you know of cases where you have to take an action to review the action of the assessor. You do that because you are not satisfied with it. In the city of New York for the present tax year there were 80,000 objections filed with respect to different parcels of real estate throughout the city. In that case, and in many cases where the assessment has been higher than the market value of the property, there would be absolutely no redress if the word of the assessor is taken and it is held he is properly qualified to testify as to value.

What is the actual experience with reference to some of these assessors? I have known of men who secured the position of tax assessor who never sold or purchased a piece of real estate in their lives, men who merely had a theoretical or book knowledge of real estate, but who had not actually been engaged in a single transaction.

Now, why would you want to qualify a man of that type as against a man who can qualify before the courts, a man who has to submit his qualifications and who has to stand cross-examination on them, in order for the court to decide whether or not he is qualified to give such testimony?

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman leaves the impression that if this bill is enacted into law the assessor will be qualified to testify as an expert by reason of the official position that he may hold?

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, he will not be disqualified. It is the same thing. He will not be disqualified. What is the difference?

Mr. PATMAN. There is considerable difference.

Mr. BOYLAN. Very little to my mind in its practical application.

Mr. PATMAN. If this bill passes, he will not be qualified to testify as an expert unless it can be first shown that he is an expert.

Mr. BOYLAN. Exactly; and what has been his experience?

Mr. PATMAN. That is for the court to decide. His experience must be shown just like that of any other witness.

Mr. BOYLAN. But I am asking the gentleman, what has been his qualification?

Mr. PATMAN. That is a question to be passed on in each individual case.

Mr. BOYLAN. His qualifications would rest solely on his experience in assessing property. That would be his only qualification.

Mr. PATMAN. This bill does not make him qualified by reason of the fact he is the assessor.

Mr. BOYLAN. No; but it does not disqualify him, and what is his background?

Mr. PATMAN. If he is otherwise qualified, this should not disqualify him.

Mr. BOYLAN. For many years he has been a tax assessor. What other qualifications can he have, because under the law he can not engage in the real-estate business while he is an employee of the tax office?

Mr. PATMAN. That is a question for the court to decide in each individual case.

Mr. BOYLAN. I am asking the gentleman to state some other qualification that he could have, and the gentleman can not do it.

Mr. PATMAN. Suppose Mr. Richards should resign and some one else should take the office to-morrow, and a case should come up and the new assessor should take the witness stand, he would first have to be shown to be an expert in that line of work.

Mr. BOYLAN. But as an assessor how can he show any experience other than his experience as an assessor?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, his observations.

Mr. BOYLAN. He can not engage in business and hold this job at the same time.

Mr. PATMAN. He knows more about the real-estate business than any other one man in the city.

Mr. BOYLAN. He might claim that he does, but, gentlemen, we are told here by the distinguished gentleman who immediately preceded me, a man for whom I have the highest admiration not only as a lawyer but as an individual and as a Member of the Congress, that he is willing to try this on the District but not on his home town. I admire the gentleman for his frankness. I admire him for his honesty in making this statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hardly think the gentleman has quoted me correctly. I think I stated explicitly that so far as my home city is concerned, I would permit the assessor to testify because there assessments are based on the actual value.

Mr. BOYLAN. That was a supplemental statement of the gentleman, and I accept that as a supplemental statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was a statement made after an interruption by the illuminary remark of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. The bare fact is this, gentlemen, and you lawyers should realize the importance of it: It has been said that it is left to the House to go into fine points of parliamentary procedure and legal procedure. You ought to see how unfair it is in having the District a party to a litigation and then under a law that we pass be able to take in an employee of the District, who naturally will have to stand by the District or else lose his job, to testify for the District. Could anything be more unfair? It has been said that the District is governed by alien Representatives who have no love or regard for the District. Irrespective of that, I only speak to you on a mere matter of justice. You men practicing in other States and in other courts would not be satisfied with legislation of this kind; and knowing, as I do, your sentiments about this matter, I say to you why should you perpetrate a glaring and a flagrant injustice upon the District such as this bill would perpetrate?

I am not in favor of excessive awards for any property anywhere, but I believe that the market price should be paid; and surely, before a justice of the supreme court and a competent jury or where cases can be tried in equity before a justice of the supreme court, exact justice there would be rendered. I am sure if we have any respect for our supreme court we will at least repose this confidence in them.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would just like to know if the gentleman thinks that the demand for this legislation comes from the brigands who were spoken of by the gentleman on the other side of the House a moment ago in an effort to add another recruit to their force.

Mr. BOYLAN. It may be. I do not quite understand about the additional place.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. As a matter of fact, it is the people who are interested in a square deal between the Government and the people who have property that is being condemned, and that is what is sought by this legislation.

Mr. BOYLAN. As I understand, the District is seeking it, not the people. The people are going to be mulcted by this legislation. The District will have an ace in the hole, their paid employee to come in and testify.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The District is making an effort to get the land just as cheap as possible and get a square deal.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I hate to disagree with my good friend from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] on this bill. I take it that he is not favorable to it. I am favorable to the bill, and I want to state my reasons, because they are based on some experience.

In my State of Ohio it was the common law that a tax authority could not testify as to the assessed value of real estate. It sometimes worked out that a man whose land was being condemned would come into court and testify that it was worth about twice as much as he had given the value to the tax assessor when the assessment was made up.

So that in my State the Legislature of Ohio passed a law to circumvent that kind of procedure and to allow tax authorities to come into court and testify as to the value upon the tax duplicate of that piece of property, sometimes made up on the value given by the owner and sometimes made up in part by figures given by the owner as to value.

Now, the reason for the ruling of the court was that when the tax is made up, when the valuation is assessed, there was no opportunity for the man who owned property to cross-examine—in other words, he did not have his day in court.

The legislature of my State, in the passage of the law, said that makes no difference, that the tax authority that makes the valuation shall have a right to go into court and testify, where they formerly did not have that right.

I have acted as a judge in cases where that proposition has come up both ways, and I am free to state that I think justice is worked out in nine times out of ten by taxing authorities testifying as to assessed values.

Now, that is the principle proposed in this bill. It does not allow a man to ask an extravagant value for property, without allowing the assessor to come in and state what was the assessed value as against this man who asks an extravagant price.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. COX. It is the law of the District that the owner of property can not come in and contest the assessment made against him.

Mr. FIESINGER. As I understand it, the assessor now can not testify in court as to the value he has put on a particular piece of property, and the object of this legislation is to say that he may come into court and testify.

Mr. COX. You simply remove the prohibition of the law against the assessor coming in and testifying.

Mr. BOYLAN. In other words, by the bill you permit a man to become an expert who is not an expert under the present regulations. Is not that right?

Mr. FIESINGER. I think the law contemplates that a man who is able to go out and make up assessments on property—by virtue of the fact that he has that ability—qualifies him as an expert.

Mr. BOYLAN. The law now disqualifies him.

Mr. FIESINGER. The law now disqualifies him, but this is to remove that disqualification.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman another minute.

Mr. BOYLAN. The assessor can not have two opinions.

Mr. FIESINGER. He ought not to.

Mr. BOYLAN. He can not have an opinion as an assessor and then another opinion as to the market value.

Mr. FIESINGER. As I understand the law, the assessed value is predicated upon the market value. At least, that is so in my State. I do not know how it is in the District of Columbia. In my State the tax valuation must be the market value.

Mr. BOYLAN. If you agree that the assessed value is the market value, then you are putting before the court the assessed value of the property.

Mr. FIESINGER. That is right.

Mr. MILLARD. The laws of the State of New York are contrary to those of the State of Ohio. The assessed valuation is not admissible evidence.

Mr. FIESINGER. That was so in the State of Ohio until a few years ago. You could not give that in testimony as against an exorbitant claim for the property.

Mr. MILLARD. That is still the law of our State.

Mr. FIESINGER. That is not the law of Ohio.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLANTON). The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOYLAN) there were—ayes 54, noes 1.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEVING THE DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS OF CERTAIN MINISTERIAL DUTIES

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2077) to relieve the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of certain ministerial duties, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the secretary of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or in his absence or upon his inability to act, such person as said commissioners may designate, when so directed by said commissioners, to execute in the name of the District of Columbia or of said board, by attaching thereto his signature as such secretary and affixing when requisite the seal of said District, any deed, contract, pleading, lease, release, regulation, notice, or other paper, which heretofore said commissioners were required to execute by subscribing thereto their respective signatures: Provided, That prior to such signing, and sealing if requisite, said deed, contract, pleading, lease, release, regulation, notice, or other paper shall first have been considered and approved by said board of commissioners, or a majority of them, sitting as a board, and evidence of such consideration and approval shall be reduced to writing and recorded in the minutes of said board of commissioners, which minutes shall thereafter be signed by the members of said board of commissioners or a majority thereof.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Members of the House are familiar with this bill. It permits the District Commissioners to issue a summons to have civilians testify in cases of investigation. The bill is unanimously reported by the committee. I find no opposition to it.

Mr. KELLER. What is the bill about?

Mr. PALMISANO. It authorizes the District Commissioners, in case of a hearing, for instance, of the police board, to summon civilians to testify. At the present time civilians may ignore them and the commissioners are compelled to go into court. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDRESS OF HON. RUTH PRATT, OF NEW YORK

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech delivered by my colleague, Mrs. PRATT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech of my colleague, Mrs. RUTH PRATT, at the luncheon of the National Republican Club, New York City, Saturday, February 6, 1932, entitled "Need for a Wider Tax Base."

The speech is as follows:

"NEED FOR WIDER TAX BASE"

The Budget and financial program laid before Congress by the President furnished a complete picture of the serious situation confronting the Federal Government. On the one hand, we must meet materially increased expenditures because of the extension of benefits to veterans and their dependents, the enlargement and hastening of the Nation's public-works program to relieve unemployment, the outlay of vast sums to aid agriculture and a larger postal deficit. On the other hand, we have witnessed a drastic and precipitous decline in revenue.

Hence, instead of the usual surpluses, we incurred a deficit of almost $903,000,000 during the last fiscal year, and are facing a prospective deficit of $2,123,000,000—almost half the probable expenditures—this year. For the fiscal year which begins July 1, despite an estimated increase of $337,000,000 in revenues expected as a result of some improvement in economic conditions, and a decline in losses from sales of capital assets as offsets, together with reductions of $365,000,000 in expenditures proposed, a deficit of $1,417,000,000 is in prospect. We are thus confronted with two alternatives—to continue spending in excess of income, with a consequent rise in the national debt, or to balance the Budget forthwith.

Some of my colleagues and a number of economists have suggested the former procedure. They point to the fact that we have reduced the national debt to the extent of nearly three and one-half billion dollars in excess of statutory requirements, and argue that we can afford to absorb a deficit of at least that much now. The surpluses which made this possible they would consider a reserve on which we should draw in hard times. It should be realized, however, that these surpluses resulted mainly from the sale of capital assets, themselves acquired with money derived from bond sales, and accordingly should have been used for no other purpose than the wiping out of the debt incurred for their acquisition. Then, too, this reserve has already been very nearly offset by the deficits of this year and last.

But what will be the attitude of investors if the Government should disregard every sound axiom of business judgment and persist in making commitments in excess of its ability to meet them? Such a temporizing policy would endanger the national credit and force the output of huge issues of securities which would remain to plague our fiscal policies in the future. It would make more difficult the coming task of retiring or refunding the $6,268,000,000 of fourth Liberty loan 4¼ per cent bonds which become callable in November, 1933, and mature in 1938. Please remember that we have not the enthusiasm of war-time psychology to aid us in marketing immense volumes of bonds, nor have we the virtual unanimity of opinion and purpose so essential for success in such a task. But even if it could again be mobilized, it would simply mean postponing the evil day. Ultimately the taxes would have to be levied—and with interest.

No; the wisest course to pursue is to balance the Budget as soon as possible. It is impossible to do so this year. The deficit is too great and the year is already more than half gone. The program of the administration is to reduce this year's expected deficit so as to prevent an increase in the debt, to balance the Budget next year, and to make the statutory requirements for debt reduction fully effective during the fiscal year 1934. With this end in view have its tax and expenditure programs been developed.

The realization that Uncle Sam has no inexhaustible fund which replenishes itself as fast as it is used up to meet the demands made upon it must have come as a great shock to the average citizen. Nor is he running a profitable business enterprise bringing him a constant stream of golden wealth; and he has no private income; hence no bulging personal pocketbook.

To pay for the services rendered by the Government, we, the citizens and beneficiaries, must put our hands into our pockets and take therefrom part of the funds intended for our personal needs as consumers. If we insist on extraordinary expenditures, either for additional functions or to provide more subsidies for particular groups or sections of the country, we must expect an additional drain on our pocketbooks. That drain comes inevitably in one way or another. There is no escape. Directly or indirectly we all share, though we may be led to think otherwise. As the President said last February, in vetoing the bill for increasing the loan value of the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates, it is the millions of hard-working families who, "in the last analysis, must bear the burden of increasing Government aid and taxes. It is not the rich who suffer. When we take employment and taxes from our people it is the poor who suffer."

Whether he knows it or not everyone pays taxes; but as no one likes to pay them knowingly, certain principles of tax gathering have grown up during the ages to make the process less painful. They are summed up in the colloquial phrase "plucking the most feathers with the least squawk." This involves: (1) Simplicity of administration, with its corollary, difficulty of avoidance; (2) adequate productivity to meet the need; and (3) political expediency, which means that, to provoke the least possible popular resentment, the fewer points at which the tax is collected, the better politically.

Combined with the doctrine of "benefit," these principles earmarked the ownership of property as the best index of taxability; and the property tax is still the chief reliance of the localities as well as of most of our States. More recently, however, as the continued assumption of additional welfare activities by the units of government made imperative the finding of more lucrative revenue sources, and partly because of a desire to "secure social justice" and "equalize the distribution of wealth," there has arisen a different tax principle—that of "ability to pay." Progressive taxation as we now know it is the result; and as experience proved that the taxation of intangible property, which is frequently more indicative of taxpaying ability than is tangible, presented insurmountable administrative problems, it was applied especially to business and personal incomes and on the estates of decedents, because shifting, which is common to practically all forms of indirect taxes, would be difficult if not wholly impossible.

These, then, are the tests applied by the Federal Government in the development of its tax system, as also by a few of the progressive States. While they seem on the whole to be sound and acceptable, the results have not been entirely beneficial. That there are some disadvantages must be apparent.

In the first place there are, unfortunately, very few sources of revenue available that meet these tests, as can be seen from an analysis of the Federal Treasury's income. The most important single source are the income taxes, which yield from 56 to 58 per cent of the total and which are divided almost equally between individual and corporate incomes. Next in importance come the miscellaneous internal revenues, accounting for some 15 or 17 per cent. Tobacco taxes, which have proven to be fairly stable, make up three-quarters of this group, most of the balance being made up in almost equal proportions of estate taxes on the one hand and stamp taxes, chiefly on the issue and sale of securities and on playing cards, on the other. Customs duties, which have usually furnished almost as much money as the miscellaneous internal revenues, declined to 12 per cent this year. Since 1924 these three sources, which thus account for 85 per cent of the Government's total income, have now fallen below 83 per cent, and in 1929 they amounted to as much as 89 per cent. Of the balance, from a third to a half comes from the proceeds of foreign government obligations; and all other sources, including some $25,000,000 annually from Panama Canal tolls, provide the remainder.

Because the sources are so few which meet the tests there is a constant clash of interest between the Nation and the States as they attempt to take full advantage of the possibilities in the course of developing their revenue systems. The inheritance tax, for example, is shared by both jurisdictions, the State tax being allowed as an offset to the extent of 80 per cent of the Federal levy. Many are taxed by both, or are likely to be, presenting the danger that between them they may "kill the goose that laid the golden egg." The situation has become so serious that Under Secretary of the Treasury Ogden L. Mills has proposed a survey to delimit the fields of these respective jurisdictions and to determine their just claims.

Another inherent difficulty is the fact that except for the tobacco taxes, which have grown steadily and remained comparatively stable even under adverse conditions, the yield is uncertain because too dependent on business prosperity. This is obviously true of customs receipts, which, as a result of the drop in both the value and the volume of imports, fell one-third to $378,000,000 in 1931. The direct relationship between the economic situation and business profits, from which most income taxes come, is such that the depression can to some extent be measured by the yield, which is estimated this year to be approximately half that of 1930. Of an anticipated loss in taxes amounting to $1,530,000,000 during the current fiscal year, income taxes will be responsible for $1,271,000,000.

But it is the individual income tax that exemplifies most strikingly the susceptibility to variation with the cycles of prosperity and depression. Returns for the calendar year 1930 filed up to the end of August numbered 3,376,552. Of these, 1,430,000, or 42 per cent, yielded no tax. Another 1,689,000, slightly more than half (though seven-eighths of those taxable), paid only 6 per cent of the tax, $27,840,000. The remaining 257,640 returns, 7½ per cent of the total, yielded $445,850,000, or more than 94 per cent of the taxes paid. In 1930, 14,816 individuals, one-third of 1 per cent of the 4,034,702 who filed returns, paid $653,390,000 on their 1929 incomes—65.2 per cent of the total tax. On the 3,012,256 returns with net incomes under $5,000, three-quarters of all returns filed, only $4,387,261 was paid, less than half of 1 per cent of the total tax.

It is clear that a very small number of large and comparatively large incomes bear practically the full burden of the individual income tax. Yet it is these large incomes which are most susceptible to the widest variations because they include business profits, and even more because in recent years the element of gain or loss from the sale of capital assets has had a preponderating influence. The facts are readily discernible in a comparison of the returns for the calendar years 1928 and 1930.

There was a slight increase in the number of taxable incomes under $5,000, but a decrease of 15 per cent in the returns filed and of 16 per cent in the tax. Incomes from $5,000 to $10,000 showed a decrease of 20 per cent in number and 27 per cent in the tax. From $10,000 to $100,000 they fell 31 per cent in number and 49 per cent in the tax paid; whereas incomes of $100,000 and over decreased 61 per cent in number and 67 per cent in the tax paid on them. The larger the incomes, it will be seen, the greater the decrease in the number of returns and even more in the amount of the tax. Naturally the fluctuations are magnified by the progressive rates imposed, which result in taxes rising faster than incomes, and conversely, falling with greater rapidity as they recede into the lower brackets.

Surely it should not require much more to indicate how dangerously narrow is the base on which rests our most important source of revenue. In 1928 and 1929 we had a population of approximately 120,000,000, consisting of nearly 30,000,000 families, with more than 70,000,000 adults over 19 years of age, of whom some 45,000,000 were gainfully employed. Yet only about 2,500,000 individuals contributed directly to the expenses of our National Government through the medium of its most lucrative single tax, which provides from a quarter to a third of the total revenues.

Figuring only one taxpayer to the family, although there were some 125,000 wives who filed separate returns, it meant that only about 1 family in 12 knowingly contributed anything to the Federal exchequer, no matter how little. Compare this with the situation in Great Britain, where, out of a population of only little more than 40,000,000, 2,250,000 paid income taxes—only a quarter million fewer income-tax payers, although the population was about one-third as large as ours.

The needed revenues can not be secured merely by increasing the surtax rates on the present group of taxpayers. It is estimated that the income-tax collections during this calendar year will not exceed $300,000,000, of which 70 per cent will come from surtaxes. If these be increased by 100 per cent, it would mean the collection of not more than $200,000,000 additional during the current year. Even if the maximum surtax rates be tripled, rising to 60 per cent on incomes over $100,000, the theoretical increase would be only $120,000,000 during the calendar year. This would not go far toward solving the problem of meeting the huge deficits in sight, even if it did not result in driving such incomes into tax-exempt securities.

Not only would it be impossible thus alone to obtain enough additional revenues, but it is feared that the liquid resources available for restoring much-needed working capital would dry up, as would also the means of furnishing the Treasury's financing in the near future. It is my fear that it may likewise destroy the resources of a comparatively small group who tax themselves voluntarily to maintain the numerous philanthropic institutions and welfare activities, which are still in private control and likely to remain so, although rendering a public service, recognized as such, and hence usually not only tax exempt but also tax supported in part.

It has been estimated that, exclusive of churches and religious activities, the sums thus provided have grown to anywhere from one and one-fourth to one and one-half billion dollars annually, almost as much as the amount spent by all the States for maintenance, operation, and interest. It would work havoc if it were to become impossible for these individuals to continue their support. Already there are indications of what it might mean in the announced liquidation of the Institute for Child Guidance and the reported deficits facing many hospitals and educational institutions which may compel their closing. Who would suffer in such event? Certainly not the rich.

The basic concept that underlies the entire program submitted by the Treasury Department is that the many not now taxed who are in a position to make some contribution to the support of the Government should be asked to do so, taking into consideration ability to pay. As Mr. Mills said in his statement to the Ways and Means Committee, this concept "must form a part of any program, for without it a solution is impossible, and it is justified not only by necessity but by equity and sound policy."

Accordingly it was suggested that we return in principle to the general plan of the 1924 revenue act, with some changes made necessary by present conditions. I am not going to discuss the details of the entire program, except as concerns the personal income tax. In addition to a sharp increase in rates, it involves a reimposition of the tax on many who, because of very high exemptions, have been freed of the obligation to contribute directly to the support of their Government, although able to furnish the very moderate amounts called for. This would add nearly 1,750,000 taxpayers and result in a net increase of slightly more than $25,000,000 from those with net incomes under $5,000. From those with incomes of from $5,000 to $10,000 an additional $13,300,000 is expected; from those with incomes up to $25,000, somewhat more than $15,000,000 additional; and $169,000,000 more from those with incomes above $25,000.

Now, what will be the result on those in the lowest income brackets? A single person with no dependents earning $2,000 a year will pay $15, and $30 if he earns $3,000. If married and having one child, he will pay only $1.50 on a $3,000 income, or still no tax if there are two children until his income exceeds $3,300. On $4,000 he would pay only $16.50 if he has one child, and $10.50 if he has two. With one child an income of $5,000 will call for a tax of only $31.50, as comparced with $650 in Great Britain, where the personal exemptions are only $485 for a single person, $730 if married, with $245 for the first child and $195 for each additional. On a net income of $10,000 the tax here would be $153 and $1,800 in Great Britain.

How slight is the burden on the average American can be seen even better from the report of the International Inquiry into the Cost of Living, which was made early last year at the request of the Ford Motor Co., based on the standards of living of the average Ford worker in Detroit receiving the minimum wage. It shows that workers in various European cities who earned the equivalent of his $1,550, which will be less than half the level required to pay any tax at all, would have to pay from $11 to $95 in taxes, representing from 1 to 8 per cent of these incomes.

A study made by a Swedish economist and former Minister of Finance, based on 1930 conditions, shows that whereas the average American paid almost nothing on incomes up to $4,500, one-fifth of 1 per cent on incomes of $7,500, and less than one-half of 1 per cent on $10,000, in Germany and France they paid 5½ per cent on incomes of $2,000, 9½ to 11½ per cent on $4,500, nearly 15 per cent on $7,500, and up to 18½ per cent on $10,000. Compared with Europeans, the average American is practically, if not actually, exempt from income taxation.

Of course, it is not popular politically to talk of reducing exemptions and restoring to the tax rolls the voters who had been taken off. In a representative government like ours, however, it is highly desirable. If he were called upon to pay directly what he is now paying indirectly, the citizen would see that he is not getting off scot-free, as he thinks. If he could know when he makes up his personal budget how much he is being called upon to contribute to its support, it would give him a greater interest in his Government. He would watch it more closely to see how efficiently and for what purpose his contribution is being used. Surely that is the lesson taught us by present citizen interest in their local governments, to which, by virtue of home ownership and property taxation, a much larger proportion contribute directly than to the National Government.

That citizen interest can be measured by tax consciousness is evident by the voting record in New York State. In New York City, where four families out of five live in rented quarters, less than 40 per cent of those eligible to vote by age and citizenship went to the polls to vote for governor in 1930, 45 per cent for mayor in 1929, and, despite the interest aroused by the national campaign of 1928, less than 55 per cent for President. Outside of New York City, however, where general and farm ownership means that a much larger proportion of the voters pay taxes of some kind, from 55 to 60 per cent of the voters went to the polls in 1930 and 80 per cent or more in 1928.

In closing I ask everyone within sound of my voice to give fullest cooperation to the Government in the supremely difficult task it is facing so courageously. Naturally all of us have preconceived notions on most things, and our minds would be dead set against any proposal set forth by the Government. It is only human to try to avoid taxes and to suggest that they be imposed on the other fellow, who can always afford to pay them better than we can. What we need is greater flexibility in our attitude toward the problem. We must discard this rigidity of the frozen mind just as the Government is striving to thaw out the frozen assets of the people and get them into liquid form. We should be generous enough to look at the entire picture as the Government must see it, and realize that we can not individually be the judge of the need. Rather must each one of us bear a share of the burden for the common good.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMISSION, GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1306) to provide for the incorporation of the District of Columbia Commission, George Washington Bicentennial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland calls up a Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The bill which the gentleman calls up was before the House two weeks ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is unfinished business. We have had a second reading of the bill at the former meeting when the bill was considered on last District day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the previous question was voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question was then voted down. It is before the House now for further consideration, just where we left off before.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask recognition in opposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO], who is the ranking majority member of the committee, is entitled to recognition first to offer committee amendments, and then the gentleman from New York will be recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I assume that when this bill is now brought up we are brought back to the same legislative situation we were in when it was last considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The previous question was then voted down. At that moment any person who wished to propose an amendment would have had the privilege of being recognized. I claim that any person who wishes to offer an amendment has prior recognition to the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the previous question having been voted down, it did not take off the floor the gentleman from Maryland, who stands in the position of chairman of the committee, so the parliamentarian informs the Chair.

Mr. STAFFORD. The very fact that the previous question was voted down granted the right to the opposition to offer an amendment and have control of the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is another date on this legislation, and while it is in the same situation the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland first, as acting chairman of his committee, and later will recognize some Member who is opposed to the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry. Do we understand that the gentleman from Maryland will be recognized for one hour and then the opponents of the bill be recognized for one hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland, as acting chairman of the committee, is recognized first to offer committee amendments, and if some Member does not move the previous question——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I take issue with the ruling of the Chair, because the House has affirmatively decided that the opposition is entitled to recognition, the previous question having been voted down. In the consideration of this bill we are placed in the same situation as we were when it was last considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. On a previous District day when this bill was up for consideration, the previous question was moved and the House voted down that motion. Then the opposition clearly was entitled to recognition. This is another legislative day; and that being true, it is the duty of the Chair to recognize the one standing as chairman of the committee, who is the gentleman from Maryland, to offer committee amendments. Then the Chair will recognize some one in opposition to the bill. The Chair is advised by the parliamentarian that such is the correct procedure.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not follow the statement of the Chair that the bill is coming before the House de novo. The Chair properly stated that the bill now is the unfinished business. A bill can not change its status because it is the unfinished business and carried over to another day. The previous question having been voted down, the bill is now open to the House for amendment, and on that I have asked for recognition by the Chair to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule that the one acting for the committee in calling up the bill has a right to first offer committee amendments. If the proceedings had continued on the day the previous question was voted down, then any Member opposing the bill gaining recognition could have offered an amendment; but this being another legislative day, it is the duty of the Chair to recognize the acting chairman of the committee in calling up the bill to offer committee amendments, and the Chair has done that. Regardless of his own opinion, the Chair is guided by the parliamentarian. When a parliamentary situation arises whereby the Chair can recognize some one opposed to the bill, the Chair will do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Chair permit this observation? The Chair has taken the position that, as far as this bill is concerned, the Chair will recognize the fact that the bill has been read a second time on a prior occasion, and yet the Chair by his ruling does not recognize the fact that the previous question was voted down, which gave the opposition the right to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the House that the private opinion of the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BLANTON] is the same as that of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], but the Chair is following the parliamentarian of the House in this matter, and as long as we have a parliamentarian the Chair will follow him. That is the opinion of the parliamentarian.

The gentleman from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. PALMISANO. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Wisconsin that the gentleman from Maryland does not intend to move the previous question until the Members of the House will have an opportunity to be heard, and I will say for the benefit of the Members that all objections that were made on last Monday have been corrected by amendments which we have made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Maryland can probably expedite matters by either yielding half of his time to the opposition or by reserving his time and allowing some Member of the opposition to be recognized.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, will the gentleman yield for an amendment?

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, at this time I ask unanimous consent that these committee amendments may be read so that the Members will know what they are.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are no amendments before the House at this time.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that these amendments to be offered later by the committee be read for information of the Members.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Chair will permit, I think the gentleman from Maryland, without losing his rights, could ask unanimous consent that the amendments be offered and read for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the amendments which the committee has adopted on the bill be read at this time for information. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "Campbell," insert the word "James A. Cobb";

Page 3, line 15, after the word "corporations," strike out lines 16 and 17 and insert a period;

"SEC. 2. That none of the persons herein named shall be entitled to or receive any of the profits of the corporation, but the same shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That the corporation herein formed shall cease and determine, and all of the powers granted by paragraphs A, B, C, D, and F of section 1 of this act shall terminate upon the filing of its final report and audit with the Congress of the United States, which date shall not be later than February 1, 1933: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall operate to prevent the institution of any suit or claim at law or in equity by any person, firm, or corporation growing out of any act or omission of the corporation; provided that the institution of such suit or claim shall be commenced within the period limited by the provisions of chapter 41 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the Comptroller General be, and he hereby is, authorized to audit all accounts of the corporation, including the final audit thereof."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that I am in hearty sympathy with the proposed amendments. They remove many of the objections which many Members on this side and, no doubt, on your side also had to the original bill. However, there is one provision to which I wish to direct the gentleman's attention, which has not been covered by the proposed amendments. That is in paragraph b, where authority is granted to this corporation to manufacture. It is difficult for me to conceive why the corporation should desire any authority to manufacture. I can understand how they may wish to purchase and acquire paraphernalia and the like, but I can not understand why they should desire authority to manufacture.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman from Maryland permit me to answer that?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. The idea is this: They are putting on, say, a pageant or play of some kind. Instead of buying the costumes they will manufacture them for the particular pageant or play. They will do that in the same way they will manufacture other little things in connection with other ceremonies. Suppose they wanted to use some flags. They would buy the material and put them together. It is not a case of manufacture or the sale of anything, but what they are trying to do is to get the biggest quantity for the few dollars they now have.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is a practical business man. In the cases cited by him wherein do our manufacturing establishments fail to meet those requirements? There is sufficient competition among the manufacturers of bunting, flags, and everything of that kind, so why should this corporation go into the business of manufacturing?

Mr. BLOOM. Because they can get the material much quicker, and it will be better than anything they could get by going outside.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not understand that the gentleman, representing, as he does, the great city of New York, believes in socialism or anything of that kind.

Mr. BLOOM. I am sorry the gentleman takes that view of it. This is simply for the purpose of enabling them to get costumes and things of that kind quickly and at a much cheaper price. They will take the raw materials, bring them into a room, and make up what is desired. They will be able to do it a great deal better and cheaper than going into the open market for them. I will also say to the gentleman that you can not get these things in Washington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLANTON). The Chair will state that he recognized the gentleman from Maryland as the ranking majority member of the committee, to offer such amendments as the committee proposes. The Chair thinks, after that is done, the opposition is entitled to recognition. The Chair will recognize any member of the committee who is opposed to the bill, but if there is no member of the committee opposed to the bill then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland first to offer the committee amendments.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PALMISANO for the committee: On page 1, line 10, after the word "Campbell," insert "James A. Cobb."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PALMISANO for the committee: Page 3, line 15, after the word "corporations," insert a period and strike out lines 16 and 17.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the committee amendment that is now under consideration removes the primal objection which many gentlemen had to this bill when it was originally called up for consideration. Many Members feared that the privilege extended to the corporation of granting concessions might be abused. If the District is to be the host to thousands upon thousands of citizens of the country and is going to appropriately celebrate the bicentenary of Washington's birth, even though these citizens are of the highest caliber in the District, we do not wish to have some subordinate or appointee vested with authority to exact undue prices for any concessions that might be awarded. So I wish to compliment the chairman of the committee in offering this amendment, which removes a serious objection which some Members had to the bill when it was originally proposed.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PALMISANO for the committee: Page 3, line 23, after the word "Sec.," strike out the figure "2" and insert the figure "4" and insert the following additional sections:

"SEC. 2. That none of the persons herein named shall be entitled to or receive any of the profits of the corporation, but the same shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That the corporation herein formed shall cease and determine, and all of the powers granted by paragraphs A, B, C, D, and F of section 1 of this act shall terminate upon the filing of its final report and audit with the Congress of the United States, which date shall not be later than February 1, 1933: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall operate to prevent the institution of any suit or claim at law or in equity by any person, firm, or corporation growing out of any act or omission of the corporation: Provided, That the institution of such suit or claim shall be commenced within the period limited by the provisions of chapter 41 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the Comptroller General be, and he hereby is, authorized to audit all accounts of the corporation, including the final audit thereof."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the proposed amendment. There are two separate amendments proposed; one is section 2 and one is section 3, and they are different legislative proposals entirely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposed amendments are divisible. The question is on the first division of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the second division of the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question of a division of the amendment is not debatable. The question now is on the second division of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I surely know that the present occupant of the chair does not desire to establish a precedent that I know he is personally opposed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated that now that the committee amendments had been offered the Chair would now recognize the gentleman from New York in opposition to the bill and to offer amendments if he desired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. More than that, Mr. Speaker, my interpretation of the rule is that the proposition is open to the floor, and when an amendment is offered any Member is entitled to recognition for or against the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No gentleman arose and asked recognition either for or against the committee amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me, I shall have to take issue with the position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee amendments have been adopted. If the gentleman from New York desires recognition on any motion in opposition to the bill or to offer any further amendment, the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I desire recognition for the purpose of getting the floor.

Mr. Speaker, the first proposition before us, which I believe is more important than the passage of the bill or the merits of this particular bill, is the parliamentary situation.

The bill was before the House two weeks ago and was considered under the House rules. At that time the time was entirely under the control of the chairman of the committee, and after holding the floor for some time the gentlewoman from New Jersey moved the previous question and the previous question was voted down. Thereafter the House took up other business.

The bill comes back to us to-day and I submit that the previous question having been voted down the bill retains that status. It can not acquire a new status. The previous question having been voted down, that can not be ignored at this time; and that being so, the bill comes before the House as unfinished business, and the bill is before the House now for amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will so hold, that the bill is now before the House for amendment, but the committee had the right first to offer its committee amendments. If there are any other amendments, the Chair will recognize any Member to offer them.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am not especially interested in this bill one way or the other, but I am interested in the procedure of the House, and my understanding is that always when the previous question is voted down the control goes from the chairman of the committee to the man who opposes the bill, because he is in the majority at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is exactly what the Chair believed, but the parliamentarian believed otherwise and was authority that the Chair thought should be followed.

Mr. SNELL. Granted that is so, I want to make my statement. If we had gone along with the business that day, the gentleman who would have been recognized next would have been some man opposed to the bill who wanted to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct, but no gentleman offered any amendment and no gentleman offered any motion, and the House adjourned, and this is another legislative day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I was on my feet at the time.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] tried to get recognition at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman to-day tried to get recognition, generally, without offering either any motion or any amendment.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman was entitled to recognition, in my judgment. If the matter is brought up again as unfinished business, I maintain it must be taken up at exactly the same point at which we left it the other day, and the first man to be recognized, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is leading the opposition, is the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair, and the Chair would so hold, provided the Member offered some motion or some amendment that would give him recognition.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] tried to get recognition, as I understand, and it was ruled that the chairman of the committee was entitled to preferential recognition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was following the opinion of our parliamentarian. The gentleman from New York did not offer any motion and did not offer any amendment. If he had done this, the Chair is of the opinion that he should have been recognized.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York tried to get recognition and tried to get such recognition in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to offer any amendment or to submit any motion.

Mr. SNELL. The question I am arguing is that in my judgment the gentleman should have had recognition first, because the control of the committee passed from the chairman to the gentlemen who were in the opposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair [Mr. BLANTON] will state that he thinks the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is eminently correct. The opposition in such a case is always entitled to recognition.

Mr. SNELL. I think that is the ruling that ought to be handed down, because it would be a mistake to hold otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I am more concerned with the parliamentary question. I would be horrified at any other ruling, because the next time the present occupant of the chair and myself oppose a bill we want to be protected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair now finds that he can hold in accordance with his own views and at the same hold in accordance with the views of the parliamentarian, and the Chair so rules.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the amendments that have been adopted to-day certainly remove a great many of the objections that we had to the bill the last time it was before the House. Particularly is that so with relation to the amendment striking out the language on page 3, lines 16 and 17, where this corporation under the original bill would have had the power to grant such concessions as might be desirable in connection with such corporation. That is stricken from the bill. We are to understand now that the corporation will have no such power in the bill as amended.

There are other objections that some Members are struggling with. I am glad that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] is on the floor. With the construction of these stands and seats, and so on, and the programs as planned, the gentleman from New York knows that thousands and thousands of people will come to Washington. What assurance have we that when they get here the prices for the public stands will be within reason for these American citizens who want to take part in the celebration?

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman can depend on it that incorporators, who are representative citizens of the District of Columbia, will see that the prices are within reach of the public. The gentleman should remember that this is not a profit-making proposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am glad the gentleman emphasizes that.

Mr. BLOOM. What they are trying to do is this: If the bill should not pass, they could not erect stands, they could not give any pageants. I want to emphasize the statement that they are not directly connected with the United States commission. We are helping them in every way that we possibly can, but this is a local proposition, and we are cooperating.

If we do not have this bill, they can not get a sufficient amount of money to build the stands. This is not to make money; it is to have some one able to handle money receive the cash and pay out the cash. The United States commission is not allowed to do it; we can not handle any money. If this bill should fail, you would not only stop the United States commission but you would stop the District commission from erecting these stands and producing the pageants.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman says the stands would not be built—the Government could appropriate the money to build the stands.

Mr. BLOOM. Then there is the maintenance and insurance. When you get stand builders to erect the stands they charge so much a seat. If there are a thousand seats, 50 cents a seat would be $500. But it is not the stands alone, it is all the other things that go with them. We will have pageants, perhaps pageants inside; and we have to hire a hall and costumes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it the intention of the corporation to give the privilege to some private individual to build the stands and charge admission?

Mr. BLOOM. They could do it both ways. Suppose they had a large stand erected for a pageant. We would say, "You build this stand, and the price of admission shall be 50 cents." The man that builds the stand sells the seats to pay for it. It might be done that way. I can not, of course, commit this corporation to any method that they may use to operate it. I will say that there is no thought of making money out of it. The only thing that this bill seeks to do is to provide some way of raising the money and paying out the money and sufficient for maintenance.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman recollects that two weeks ago the question was raised quite properly and stressed, that there was great danger that this would be turned over to a private concern and monopolized in the charge of admission at the cost of the public and to the people of Washington.

Mr. BLOOM. That is impossible. It could not be done for this reason: The United States commission and the District commission are cooperative. The District commission does not do anything unless we agree to it with reference to the District celebration. That could not be; there is no thought of a thing of that kind.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know the gentleman is a practical business man. When we are confronted with a situation in Washington and we believe that the prices are exorbitant, may we go to the gentleman from New York and call his attention to it, and will he help us?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But perhaps the gentleman from New York would not be able to withstand such a pressure.

Mr. BLOOM. Please give the District commission and the national commission an opportunity to do the things that we would like to do, for which you have not given us sufficient money. This is the only way that we can do it. If we do not do it in this way, we can not do it at all. We are going to protect you and all of the people who come to the District of Columbia, and you can depend upon both of these commissions to do the right thing all around.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] yield to me so that I may ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Up to the present moment, no statement has been made publicly or on the floor of the House as to what is the purpose of the gentleman's commission in the way of pageants, and the time of year when they will occur. Can the gentleman give the House some information as to when this big show is to be pulled off?

Mr. BLOOM. I am very glad that the gentleman has asked that question. He wants to know what we are going to do in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the dates when they will occur.

Mr. BLOOM. And all about it. What we are anxious to know is what you are going to do for us. You pass this bill, and within a week or 10 days we will tell you what we are going to do. If you do not pass this bill and give this national commission a chance to operate and cooperate with the District commission, we might not be able to do very much.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assuming we do pass the bill, what does the gentleman purpose doing in the way of pageants, and when—so that the public and the local hotel people may know something about it?

Mr. BLOOM. The first thing we will do, after you pass this bill, will be to call a meeting and decide on the things we would like to do and can do. Every day that you allow time to lapse takes away so much time from the things that we would like to do. We will have to work fast to make the programs that we have in mind. If you will give us an opportunity, by passing this bill, to decide on what we would like to do, then we will bring the program to you.

Mr. STAFFORD. The information the gentleman furnishes is very illuminating.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, every four years when we have inaugurations here there is a system of stands. I have just been informed by one of my colleagues that he brought a party of 16 to Washington one inaugural and had to pay $7.50 a seat on the stands. It seems to me that that is very much too high a price.

Mr. BLOOM. If things go our way next fall, then the following March we will be willing to pay twice that much on our side. I think that is cheap.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Take a family coming here in a car, wanting to participate in the celebration. If they are confronted with charges for seats at $2.50 or $3 or $4, it is too much.

Mr. BLOOM. That is regulated in different ways. The gentleman to whom the gentleman from New York refers might have paid $7.50 for a seat at some hotel or upon some private stand. For a window he might have paid $50. This is entirely different. This corporation will control it. Let us look at this from a business point of view.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But I can not look at a celebration in honor of George Washington from a business point of view. That is my objection to the bill. I would like to have the whole thing thrown open to the public.

Mr. BLOOM. I agree with the gentleman. Why not amend the bill and give the District commission $150,000 more and give the United States commission $100,000 more, and we will not charge the public for one thing. We are confronted with a situation now in the United States commission where we are having at the Corcoran Art Gallery the greatest loan exhibit of all of the great pictures from all over the world, and we are giving it free of charge, but we have not money enough to pay for printing the catalogues for this loan exhibition. After we have done this great work, after we have given the people of this country and of the world, you might say, the greatest pamphlets, the greatest books, the greatest of everything gotten out upon the history of our country, we have to come down to charging 10 or 15 or 25 cents for a little catalogue because you took off $25,000 when we needed it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Senate took that off.

Mr. BLOOM. The House took it off also. Members of the House have been asking for a sufficient number of portraits of George Washington to send to their constituents and to their lodge rooms. We had to cut our order because you took off $25,000. Now you are objecting to what we are doing. You are objecting to our selling anything. You want these things, but you do not give us a chance to sell them. Give the District commission some money and they will not charge for anything.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire for information as to the detailed cost for having these pageants during the proper celebration of the bicentennial free to the public, rather than exacting fees to be paid to concessionaires to erect stands along the public highways, or wherever these pageants will be presented.

Mr. BLOOM. I would say that $100,000 more to the District of Columbia would pay for everything, aside from what they already have.

Mr. STAFFORD. In his previous statement the gentleman supplemented that by saying "and give the commission an additional $150,000." What would the $150,000 be for?

Mr. BLOOM. The United States commission?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. I understood the gentleman's preliminary statement to be to that effect. I am seeking to know what it will cost in the District of Columbia to put on a proper show, pageants and the like, without making any charge whatsoever to those who come to the District to see the pageants.

Mr. BLOOM. In my original estimate of what it would cost, we estimated for Mother's Day ten or fifteen thousand dollars; we estimated for ceremonies for the opening of Wakefield about $10,000, for everything to have a complete celebration. That was completely cut out, so that we have no money for celebrating any special days; that is, the United States commission has no money for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking to ascertain what it would cost to put on a proper pageant in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOOM. Well, we must divorce the two. The District is one celebration and the national celebration is another. The gentleman has asked two questions. If the District can be given $100,000 additional, it can build stands and can give pageants, with our cooperation, and that will pay for everything, and perhaps will leave a little surplus.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then if Congress would be willing to appropriate $100,000 for an appropriate show for these pageants in the District, would the gentleman then feel the need of having this commission of these distinguished men, or should it be left entirely to the District Commissioners?

Mr. BLOOM. Well, we must remember that this list of names is a list of the District commission. That is where we get this list.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman would still wish to have the District commission incorporated and appropriate $100,000 for these pageants?

Mr. BLOOM. No. I do not think it would be necessary. If we will appropriate $100,000, then we do not need this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. But to whom should we appropriate the money? To the District Commissioners?

Mr. BLOOM. To the District commission. You appropriated $100,000 for the District commission for the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. If you give them another $100,000, then you will not need this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How are they expending the $200,000, generally?

Mr. BLOOM. Well, there will be eight months of celebration. They start to celebrate on February 22, and it will continue up to and including Thanksgiving Day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to thank the gentleman now for his explicit reply, very much belated, as to when this celebration will be held. The gentleman now says it will continue for eight months, dating from the anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. As a member of the National George Washington Bicentennial Commission, I wish to say a few words in regard to this bill.

I hope the Members of the House will distinguish clearly between the bicentennial celebration as a national affair and the bicentennial celebration in the District of Columbia. The national commission was appointed some seven years ago, and for several years no plan was arrived at. Finally, after about five years of incubation, the plan came forth, which, in brief, is to have the celebration by the people and among the people themselves in the 48 States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories. The idea of attempting to fittingly celebrate such an event by one single celebration, here in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, did not commend itself to our commission. Such a celebration only a comparatively few people could attend. We finally decided that it would be better to call upon all the American people everywhere—in States, cities, towns, and hamlets—to join in arranging local celebrations appropriate and befitting this greatest figure in our national life. Under a somewhat meager appropriation by Congress, we undertook to cooperate with the States, municipalities, and other organizations by supplying literature and other material, but our chief concern has been to secure the cooperation of the people themselves to properly celebrate the bicentennial of George Washington's birth. For the last two years the commission has been pushing this idea.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] and Col. U. S. Grant, 3d, were selected as directors to carry out the idea of the commission and to get it out to the whole country. Please observe that the plan did not contemplate a single celebration here in Washington, but a number of celebrations in every State of the Union, in every city, town, and hamlet all over the country. The commission, through the efforts of the directors, has gotten in touch with every State, every city, every governor, mayor, selectman, even down to the smallest hamlet, urging them to appropriately celebrate this bicentennial.

Some States have appropriated considerable sums of money. The gentleman's State of New York has appropriated quite a sum for the celebration of this great event. The District of Columbia occupies, in this respect, the same position as an individual State. A commission was appointed here in the District to arrange for a fitting celebration of the event here in the city bearing Washington's name. The commission has gone forward with the work satisfactorily. Congress was asked to appropriate, and did appropriate, from District funds for this District celebration a certain sum. The sum appropriated was in no wise adequate for the magnitude of the celebration very properly desired by the people of Washington. The sum is not sufficient, and, for one, I think it should not be sufficient to put on a celebration such as should be held in the District of Columbia. I think it is perfectly proper in order to put on pageants or other appropriate festivities to erect temporary stands and to charge admission, if it is all properly regulated, as it will be. It is not only perfectly proper but the people who have the privilege of enjoying it will be delighted to pay for this celebration. To carry out the purposes I have indicated is all this corporation is asked for.

Certain public-spirited men and women in this District by asking for this corporation in effect have said, "If you will incorporate us into a legal corporation, so that we may not, by some untoward accident for which we are not to blame, endanger our private fortunes, we stand ready to shoulder the burden of this particular community in sponsoring a celebration worthy the name of Washington."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then the interest of the Bicentennial Commission in this bill is exactly what it would be with regard to any city in the country, or the celebration in any city?

Mr. TILSON. Just the same as in a city of the gentleman's State, as far as the national commission is concerned.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The passage of this bill in no wise has any bearing on the Bicentennial Commission, its activities, or the performance of its duties.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands, of course, that we are cooperating with every State so far as they will cooperate with us, and especially so with the District, being located in the same place. Therefore it may be that we are cooperating possibly to a somewhat greater degree in the District because we are able to do so by reason of our proximity.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Just how does the passage of this bill contribute to the activities of the commission in any way?

Mr. TILSON. Not to the national commission at all. It will, however, contribute very materially to the District of Columbia celebration, in which the national commission is, of course, very much interested.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But nothing to the national commission?

Mr. TILSON. This bill is not intended to affect the national commission in any way. It seems to me the bill is perfectly plain. It is a business proposition. All that these people wish is to be legally incorporated. If Members will read the list of the proposed incorporators they will find that they are not the kind of people who would be interested in an undertaking of this character by reason of the hope of private gain. There is no danger of any abuse here.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MAY. The only purpose of this bill, as I gather from the gentleman's explanation, is to exempt the men who are promoting this thing in the District of Columbia from actions for damages resulting from any accident that might happen.

Mr. TILSON. One purpose is to exempt them from personal actions for damages resulting from accidents for which they are in no wise to blame. It is also to permit them to act as an entity, as a legal corporation, rather than as a partnership or voluntary association of some sort.

Mr. MAY. Or as individuals?

Mr. TILSON. Or as individuals. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BLOOM. May I add this: The District commission is in the same position as the national commission. They can not buy or sell anything. If we wanted to do so, we could not charge an admission fee to anything that may be carried on. If we did so, it would go back to the Treasury, anyway, and that is something they can not do.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, to my mind this bill has been well discussed by the Members of the House, and I now move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill (H. R. 5341) was laid on the table.

PROTECTION OF UNION LABELS AND SIMILAR INSIGNIA IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2173) to authorize associations of employees in the District of Columbia to adopt a device to designate the products of the labor of their members, to punish illegal use or imitation of such device, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2173, with Mr. JONES in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five minutes. This is a bill to authorize associations in the District of Columbia, particularly the union organizations in the District of Columbia, to adopt some emblem or some mark of designation. It seems they are having some trouble in the District. It seems they are unable to obtain some sort of insignia whereby they can be recognized. The purpose of this bill is to give them recognition and to punish anyone who illegally uses the same or makes an imitation of the same. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. The President of the United States has recently announced a national program to urge our citizens to cease hoarding money and renew their custom of depositing in banks. A number of prominent spokesmen for the administration have, in addition, very loudly advocated a reduction in the wages of Federal employees in order to reduce the deficit.

Apropos of these two latest administration methods of restoring prosperity, there appeared in the February 3 issue of Standard Trade and Securities a table showing the liquidity of New York and country banks. There also has appeared in the Wall Street Journal under date of February 4 a statement that the receiver, assistant receiver, and the attorney for the receiver of the Wabash Railroad have agreed to a 10 per cent cut in income. These two items apparently have little connection, but I shall attempt to show that they do demonstrate the utter futility of the Hoover antihoarding program and bear very strongly on the injustice of drastic reductions in Federal employees' wages at the present time.

When the depression started our Executive called together the industrial leaders in this country and urged them (at least in the newspapers) to maintain the former wage scale. The next item of interest appearing in the newspapers was a series of drastic wage reductions all over the country, and included in those reductions were a number of companies having contracts with the Government of the United States. The program of the President to urge people to bring their money back into banks where their accounts are in no way insured will be just as futile as his advertised program to maintain wages above their economic justification.

Speaking of this program to prevent hoarding, by which all of the luncheon clubs and all the oratorical boys in the different communities are going to urge the people to bring their money out and place it on deposit, I see in this publication of Standard Securities a report for the month of December to the effect that the New York banks are now practically 61 per cent liquid, and the country banks are substantially 45 per cent liquid.

The thing that this impresses upon my mind is this. How can we go before the people of this country, Mr. Common Man or the average citizen, and urge him to deposit his money in the banks in order to get it into circulation, when the banks themselves, or at least some of them, are hoarding more than any other institution? The First National, for instance, owns quick assets consisting of cash, governmental, State, and New York bonds and some demand notes of 123 per cent of their deposits. Not much in industrial circulation there!

I am not blaming them for this. This is sane business. It is the proper thing to do, probably, at this time. They do not risk turning their funds into circulation unless they are secured. The Federal Government does not deposit or put out a single cent in a depository that is not secured. There is not a State or county or school board in this country that deposits money any place without being secured, and yet we are starting a campaign to urge the private citizen, against all of his own common sense, to take his money out of the sock and place it in the bank for the use of other people.

I have also received to-day a letter from a clearing house in my district urging that the amount of money in postal savings accounts be not increased, in order to compel depositors to place their savings in the bank.

This is very commendable, in purpose, but why should we take any action to prevent the laborer or the wage earner from taking the same steps to protect himself that the Government and the banks and all public institutions and departments of our Government take to protect themselves? The gist of the whole proposition is that the people are demanding that they have some security, the same as the Government, and I submit they are entitled to such security. You may talk to them until you are blue in the face, but you will not persuade them to deposit their money in the banks unless you let them know that they have security back of such deposits.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. The thing that the people of the United States are asking is that their deposits in the banks be secured, and it is nothing more than fair. We do not ask a soldier to go on the field of battle, or at least we did not in the last war, without securing his dependents from suffering all of the loss from his death or injury. There are few, if any, States that do not secure the industrial employee so that he does not have to suffer all of the loss from industrial accident. Why should we compel a depositor, just because he happens to place his money in one bank that may appear as good as another, to suffer a disproportionate loss of his funds from the failure of such bank? There is no reason back of it.

It has been said that there has been lost but little more than 2 per cent of all the money on deposit in the banks in this country during this depression. Think what an infinitesimally small annual premium would secure these bank accounts. There is no reason why we should not do this, and if we do, we can get the money in the banks without having to do all this campaigning to persuade a man to do something that his common sense tells him he should not do.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. Is it the gentleman's opinion that if we have a national-bank guarantee law, where the money that is placed in the banks on deposit is absolutely guaranteed, this money that is hidden away now and that the President is talking about would be back in the banks and back in circulation in a very short time?

Mr. HARLAN. I certainly do, and I further believe, Mr. Chairman, if we had such a law as that we would not have to be incorporating a refinance corporation at this time, because the ultimate result of this Refinance Corporation does nothing but give the depositor the security he is seeking. He takes the money out of the garret and buys the bonds and the Government gives him the security he wants, and then the money is turned around and deposited back in the bank and, in the meantime, the small depositor has received his security.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement and it seems to me it covers the case very adequately, except, possibly, in the case of the State banks. What suggestion would the gentleman have in order that State banks may have the same opportunity that the national banks would have under this procedure?

Mr. HARLAN. I should say practically the same protection that we place around State banks going into the reserve system.

Mr. KETCHAM. Then, if the gentleman please, that would necessarily require that every State bank should become identified with the Federal reserve system, and not all of them have so become identified.

Mr. HARLAN. It would simply be up to the bank that is seeking deposits. If they want the benefit of this or if they want the confidence that would be entailed, they can take advantage of this membership. If they do not, they can let it alone; but they will not be banks very long.

Mr. KETCHAM. From what the gentleman says, he can see no practical difficulty in this matter in arranging for State banks to have the same privilege as the national banks, provided they come under the Federal reserve system.

Mr. HARLAN. Absolutely not. We must avert the danger of the Government going into the banking business on the one hand, and the danger of wild-cat and reckless banking on the other by a system of semiweekly reports to the Federal reserve bank authorities showing the outstanding loans, the securities therefor, and extent of renewals, thus affording a proper observation on the insured banks. When the loans are not properly secured, the bank's credit becomes impaired—very much like our insurance companies. The reserve bank could then step in and supervise the credit. But as long as these insured banks are not impaired they could proceed, as they are doing now, with little or no interference.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I should like to say to the gentleman from Maryland that I am being subjected to a few more questions than I expected, and I wondered if he would give me some more time.

Mr. PALMISANO. I suppose so.

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. With reference to the State banks, if we had a national bank guarantee law, does not the gentleman believe that the States would follow with a State guarantee law?

Mr. HARLAN. In answer to the gentleman's question, I believe that might be so; but our experience is the State guarantee laws have not been of the best and pursuing that line is a little difficult, at all events. In this body we are only concerned with Federal questions.

Turning for a moment to the question of wage reductions of Federal employees, in the copy of the Wall Street Journal which I have here is a notice to the effect that the receivers of the Wabash Railroad Co. have applied to our Refinance Corporation for a loan of $15,000,000. As a special concession for obtaining the $15,000,000, the receiver, who is now getting $40,000 a year, his assistant receiver, now receiving $20,000 a year, and the attorney for the receiver, who gets $25,000 a year, have generously offered to accept a 10 per cent cut in wages.

The Wabash Railroad is now in the hands of receivers. About two weeks ago it was announced that they were about to pass a dividend, but I do not know whether that has been done or not.

These officials and those of banks and other public-service and financial institutions are just as much public servants and public conservators as the officials in the Federal employ.

I submit that if the officers and high-bracket employees of these different institutions do not accept a substantial wage reduction, they are not entitled to the aid from our Refinance Corporation; and if the governors of our Refinance Corporation extend aid without cutting pay rolls to the bone, those governors are not performing their duties. We can effect a greater saving and benefit to the taxpayers and the wage earners of this country by that means than we can in the reduction of Federal employees' wages, because we will hasten public confidence in our banks and we will reduce the waste in governmental aid.

I do not wish to assume the rôle of demagogue, disparaging men receiving high salaries, because that would be absurd; but in time of prosperity when they were making money there was an excuse for paying salaries commensurate with the abilities required. Now, however, we are in a drastic situation. The Federal Government is doing things hardly justified in any government, in practically going into the banking business, and it would clearly seem reasonable that before any aid is extended by this institution which we have incorporated and given $2,000,000, without any supervision at all, the board of governors should see to it that the high-salaried men in banks and railroads have their salaries reduced not 10 per cent but to a mark that would really mean something during the period of Federal aid.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. Can the gentleman tell us who fixed the salaries of the receivers, the assistant receivers, and the attorneys?

Mr. HARLAN. The salaries in the Wabash Railroad case, of course, were fixed by the court.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman referred to high-salaried men in banks who have the required ability. By that he does not mean that all of these bank presidents have the required ability?

Mr. HARLAN. Possibly not; but they require ability now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But a great many of them have not the required ability.

Mr. HARLAN. They have not exhibited it, at least.

I have supported every one of the financial measures proposed by the administration, because I feel that they can do little harm and may do some good. I regret very much that they were not put in force at least eight months prior to their actual enactment so that we might have attempted to save many of the banks that have failed and many of the foreclosures that have occurred during that time. However, I do not believe that there is any economist who believes that they are in any way a permanent remedy for our present economic ills. These can only be cured with the revival of international trade, and that trade is almost hopelessly strangled by our present network of retaliatory tariffs.

We must, furthermore, establish permanent confidence in our financial institutions by distributing the burden of bank failures. People demand, and justly demand, security for the money which they turn over to others for administration. Should prosperity return, the deposits will no doubt return to the banks, but when the first clouds appear on the horizon the people will follow their instinct of self-preservation and begin to hoard.

The third step for the achievement of something like permanent prosperity in this country is the abolition of the perfectly absurd and ridiculous burden which we are now bearing to procure a travesty on law enforcement. The people may either be right or wrong in their attitude toward Puritanical laws and hoarding, but right or wrong, they are going to follow their own convictions; and, in the meantime it is up to the Government of the United States to respect the convictions of a majority of its people.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the press to-day reports that our Republican friends are rejoicing because of an interpretation they have put upon the statement of a leading citizen of the State of New York. It is said they now expect him to be the Democratic nominee in the coming election.

Mr. FOSS. For what office?

Mr. BLANTON. For the high office of President of the United States. I am merely one humble Democrat, but I represent a district of Democrats, who have been Democrats practically all of their lives. They have never gotten off the reservation except once, and that was when this same distinguished gentleman was in 1928 at the head of our ticket. Let me call attention to exactly what Gov. Alfred E. Smith said in his press statement to-day, and if you Republican brethren will listen I do not think that you will get much comfort out of it. He said:

> If the Democratic national convention, after careful consideration, should decide that it wants me to lead, I will make the fight.

In my judgment, that puts him out of the running before things get started, because, if the opinion of a humble Democrat may be accepted, the convention will not have to wait for careful consideration, because Governor Smith will not be seriously considered again, and he is already eliminated.

I was one of those who faithfully and loyally supported my ticket in 1928. For many years I have fought uncompromisingly the main thing that Governor Smith espoused. I put aside my own feelings in the matter. I felt that the Democratic Party meant more to the people and was bigger than any man that ever appeared on its ticket.

I supported my ticket. I supported it at a great personal sacrifice. I supported it faithfully and honestly, because I knew that the party was a great party, and every Democrat who supported that ticket did it at a personal sacrifice, I do not care how he stood on public questions. He made a personal sacrifice that meant much to him. Many of them made sacrifices that swept them out of office, and many of them made sacrifices in 1928 that may yet sweep them out of public office, because the public when it goes into the little booth to mark its ballot, goes in there to speak its own private personal sentiments, and the people were uncompromisingly against some of the things that the head of our ticket stood for.

I am one of those who rejoices in the fact that Governor Smith has been a big enough man not to inject himself into this campaign. He has not done it yet, and I do not believe he will do it. I believe that he will be faithful and loyal enough to the best interests of our party, and to the personal interests of the members of the Democratic Party, who signally honored him in 1928 with their greatest gift, to keep out of it; and I believe that those friends of ours in New York who have been his ardent supporters and have made sacrifices for him, and who appreciate the sacrifices all other Democrats have made for him, will applaud him for keeping out of it, because things are ripe now for a great Democratic victory in November if we will just keep all highly controversial matters out of our party.

Mr. MAY. But suppose we nominate JOHN GARNER, of Texas; we will sure win, will we not?

Mr. BLANTON. JOHN GARNER would sweep the country as sure as we live. For he has the absolute confidence of the people everywhere. There is no man who can touch him anywhere in the United States as a leader of men on public questions. He has led the opposition here across the aisle so many times and made them follow him so many times that he has demonstrated to the business interests of the country that he is the best and safest leader in the whole United States.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will not the gentleman give the progressives a little credit for that?

Mr. BLANTON. If he were nominated, he would carry every progressive in the United States. Because he thinks of, with, and for the common people. We would find the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] on the stump making his unanswerable speeches for JOHN GARNER in the interest of the public, if such a nomination were made. But I have no right to speak for our distinguished leader. Until he permits us to present him, we must hold our inclinations in abeyance. He knows more about politics and more about Government business and problems and all other things than the rest of us will know in many years. He is the popular choice of the people now, and if we could only persuade him to run, he would sweep the country. I have no right to speak for him, but I am saying to my Republican brethren that they better quit rejoicing, because they will not have Al Smith on the ticket.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is making a very interesting statement. I am wondering, in view of his statement, if Al Smith should be the candidate on the Democratic ticket, whether the gentleman would support him as he did before?

Mr. BLANTON. I am always frank. I always support my Democratic ticket as long as I am a Democrat. But what the gentleman from Michigan suggests as a possibility is hardly conceivable, for Governor Smith is a loyal Democrat, and he knows that his nomination would disrupt Democrats everywhere, and absolutely ruin all chances of success for his Democratic Party.

You will find me fighting for Democratic principles and for our ticket no matter who is on it. I believe in the Democratic Party. It is the party of the people. From its very beginning, it has been against special privileges to classes. It stands for equal opportunity to all. The gentleman's party has stood always for special privilege to classes. It is the party of special privileges. My party has stood for the people, and I am loyally for it; but I want to say that the Democrats of this country are going into that convention shoulder to shoulder making a fight that will win to get this country back in good condition, and the business men of the country are going to be behind us. The business men of the country have watched our distinguished leader in this House, and he has gained their confidence. They are back of him and they will support him without hesitation. They want normal times again.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. I have always thought the gentleman was a great believer in principle, and I know he has been. He has been a great believer for the things which he thought were right. In view of the statement the gentleman has just made, assuming that the gentleman's party should nominate a man who fundamentally disagreed with the principles of the gentleman, would the gentleman still vote for him, as he stated, simply because he is a Democrat?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend from Michigan that every single plank in the platform of the Democratic Party is a plank of principles, and high principles. It always has been. There are so many fine planks, all planks of principle, that any Democrat can support the Democratic platform no matter who the candidates are who may head the ticket. [Laughter.] You can always do that. The gentleman from Michigan, who thinks just as I do on a few fundamental questions, and who stands for principle as I do, if he could get a man who was just a little wetter than wet Mr. Hoover, he would still support him. What is the difference between Al Smith and Mr. Hoover? Al Smith is frank. He comes out and says, "I am wet." Mr. Hoover says nothing, and is a wet nevertheless. I do not know whether the gentleman has seen the advance edition of the fake so-called Times Herald of February 30 or not that came to our offices to-day, but he will find that his champion flag bearer is heralded abroad in advance as the wet advocate of repeal.

I just want to say in conclusion that while I loyally supported my ticket in 1928, I am unalterably opposed to Gov. Alfred E. Smith heading our ticket again this year. And as one Democrat I want him to know that the people in my district who supported him in 1928 are now 90 per cent against him, and it is not a question of Catholicism either, and we commend him for not being a candidate.

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield to the gentleman from Texas two additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. I received a very interesting letter this morning from a cornfield constituent, and I am sure it would be interesting to the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman has been discussing candidates. This man who wrote me says that the Republic now has only three white hopes, and he names them in order: Garner, Roosevelt, and Rainey. Does the gentleman from Texas pin his hope to one of those three?

Mr. BLANTON. I am for all of them. I am for every good Democrat, and the gentleman has mentioned three very good ones. I am for every one of them. [Applause and laughter.] I wish all three of them could be candidates. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. HOWARD. Well, that is about as good as I expected. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman how he stands on that question?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, how he stands? As early as July the gentleman from Nebraska publicly proclaimed not only his support of Franklin D. Roosevelt but he made a prophecy, and his prophecies always come true, that Roosevelt would be the next President of the United States in spite of the international bankers and the Power Trust. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I believe we will have two on the ticket whom the gentleman from Nebraska can follow without any trouble at all, and they will be eminent statesmen I am going to follow. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I did not want to enter into a discussion with the gentleman from Texas, but now that he has made the nominations for the National Democratic Party, I do not believe I will be consulted in that any more than I will be consulted in the National Republican Convention. But when the gentleman raises a question as to planks and principles and raises the question of how wet Mr. Hoover may be or how wet Mr. Smith is, then, of course, I think the suggestion requires an answer. I do not believe that Al Smith lost votes in the gentleman's State because of liquor. I think it was more a question of water, the kind of water contained in the fount when he was baptized.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the first time in its history that my State ever went Republican and it is the first time in history that my district ever went Republican, and it went for Mr. Hoover by 11,000 votes. That does not mean that they are not Democrats, but that the people refused to indorse his proposed repeal of the eighteenth amendment. It was not because of Catholicism either. What did Baltimore do, the Catholic hub of the Nation? Even Baltimore went against Governor Smith. Many of the Catholics in my State voted against him.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that his platform, in all likelihood, will have a wet plank in it.

Mr. BLANTON. If it does it will be over my objection. If it does it will beat the Democratic Party worse than we have ever been beaten before.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I now say that if my party has not got a wet plank in it I will not support it. Will the gentleman say as much on the reverse side?

Mr. BLANTON. I will say I am going to do everything in my power to keep a wet plank out of our Democratic platform. I will promise the gentleman that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But if a wet plank goes in, what then?

Mr. BLANTON. I am still a Democrat. [Laughter and applause.] But God forbid that such a calamity should happen. It would cause millions of Democrats everywhere to refuse to support their ticket.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there are so many important issues that the people of this country must decide that they refuse to be separated on the wet and dry question. If prohibition had been a success, and if you had prohibition in this country to-day, it would not be an issue and we would not be talking about liquor in the face of important economic problems to solve; but in the absence of enforcement, after 11 years of complete failure, after spending millions and millions of dollars in attempted enforcement, then I say the people of this country, whether Republicans or Democrats, are not going to permit politicians to play with this question any longer, and they will demand a clear-cut declaration from both of the great parties.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield now.

Reference was made to-day to a publication that is being distributed. Let me say that that publication comes from a group of stand-pat, black Republicans, and the next thing to follow will be a declaration on the part of the contributors to the Republican campaign fund that unless the Republican Party takes a decided stand on prohibition and puts a real, honest wet plank in their platform there will be no contributions to the Republican campaign fund.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield now.

Mr. BLANTON. Then if it does that your Republican Party is doomed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say that this question, this great moral issue will never be decided until the great parties take a stand on it. If one party takes the wet side and the other party takes the dry side then men of free will will vote according to their convictions and not according to a party label. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the great questions which we are talking about, that will be an issue in the next campaign, I want to call your attention to one that will be an outstanding and vital one this summer and fall, in case conditions do not change, and that is the unemployment problem.

A little more than two years ago we were told by prophets that the unemployment situation was on a distinct upturn, that in a few days, or 60 days, or such a matter, the country would be back to normal. We were also told that the big industries were not going to reduce wages but were going to continue under the conditions which were in existence in October, 1929. Time and again we have heard those pronouncements and similar ones since then, yet to-day we are facing the fact, according to the latest statistics, that between seven and ten million men are out of employment, men who have no employment at all, and in addition we have another large group—no one seems to know how many—who are on part-time employment.

During this session of Congress we have passed several measures which we were told were going to relieve the country of present conditions. We see those measures getting under way, yet more and more disappointment comes to us and we begin to question how much value these measures will be.

These other questions are important and I am interested in them and their solution, but I want to say in my judgment we do have one great question in this country, one outstanding question, and one that any candidate for President or any other office in this country should think about and to which he should give serious thought, and that is the solving of the problem of unemployment. If we could solve the problem of unemployment and get our people at work that would go a long way toward solving the great questions which face this country at this time.

Just think of the great farm problem in the country. Why is not the farmer able to sell his produce? For the simple reason that the man who needs it does not have income enough to purchase it. There is hardly any other thing which you can mention but what unemployment is fundamentally at the basis of the evil.

I agree with the President, who was then Candidate Hoover, when he said in his Newark speech, September 17, 1928:

> The problem of insuring full-time work all the time is a problem of national concern.

And again in same speech—

> It is one which government only contributes to solve.

Here he takes the position that the Government has a definite responsibility. I believe that we, in response to that belief, should act immediately to carry out that responsibility. In an emergency like this we should act at once to relieve the situation, and then we should act to bring about permanent legislation so that this will not occur again.

One of the causes of the farmers' condition is the lack of income among the masses. We must act. The farmer's problem is just one big problem, but there are others caused by this unemployment, and to get out of the morass we must remove the causes which contribute to make conditions as they exist in this country to-day. For instance, you take the post offices. In practically all of the post offices the receipts are being reduced so that they are being taken from one class and put in a lower class. All of this causes more and more unemployment, and the beginning of it was brought about by unemployment. This is a national question.

We are told that in 1929 the laboring man lost about $10,000,000,000 of his income and that in 1931 he lost over $11,000,000,000. No country and no industry in a country where this is true can be prosperous, except those few protected given monopolies to oppress the masses.

In my judgment, you can organize all the corporations you want in order to bolster up big business; you can pass all the tariff legislation you want and build up animosity between our country and foreign countries and compel them to pass retaliatory tariffs; and this will only bring about more and more trouble and will not go to the root of the fundamental evil and solve the great questions which we face.

To-day you can take the prices of the different commodities which the farmer has to sell, and the reason those prices are so low is because the men who need the commodities do not have the income to purchase them. Fundamentally, that is the trouble. The trouble is that the men who need these things—millions of our people in the cities and other places—can not purchase them because they do not have the purchasing power. Those are the questions which are facing us to-day. You can have a conference at the White House every day of the week, and you can make some great pronouncement that you are going to help 20,000,000 people, but unless you put back in the hands of the great masses of the people the purchasing power you can not solve these questions which face this country.

As a Member of this Congress I would like to see something constructive done. Something should be brought about now to restore the purchasing power of our people. The Government can contribute in two ways—by starting a needful system of public works, and then evolve legislation to prevent the recurrence of such a condition.

I know that the Government alone can not take up all the slack in unemployment, but we can help and should help by public works which are needed and economical, as road building and public buildings. All of this will stimulate work and industry and scatter more money among our people, which will increase purchasing power, which is sorely needed at this time, and will benefit business, banking, debtors, and everyone.

Also, there ought to be some permanent legislation whereby we will prevent a recurrence of such a condition.

The administration that is in power now, it seems to me, is going right along just as if this is an evil that has to come to us every so often, and the only thing we can do about it is to blindly go through it, with the hope we will never have such a condition to contend with again or with the hope the time may be prolonged after we do get through with it.

It has been 27 months since the trend started downward, and according to the statistics I do not think anyone has estimated the unemployed in this great country to-day at less than it was at any time previous to this time. In other words, so far as we know, and in spite of all the money that has been appropriated to bolster up big business, we are still on the downward trend, or certainly no signs of an upward trend.

Again, I say, I believe Congress should make some kind of temporary provision to deal with this question immediately and then formulate something of a permanent nature to see that such a condition as this does not come upon us again. For instance, you take this argument that the Government ought to stay out of business is stressed until big business wants the Government in business on its side, and then a demand comes. In my humble judgment the impotency of big business to deal with the situation is stressed in the demand for the Finance Corporation.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. My time is short, but I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. PATMAN. What does the gentleman think about paying off the adjusted-service certificates? That would put $2,200,000,000 in circulation.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have supported that legislation all the time, and I am in favor of it. I am in favor of anything to increase the income of our people in this country; and, too, I have always voted with the soldier and service man on such legislation, and expect to continue. I believe the Congress and the people ought to formulate some permanent machinery, a national council or something of that sort, to deal with this situation and see that it shall not occur again.

As I have said, big business gets alarmed when we talk about the Government going into business or seeing after the masses of the people. I do not believe that the Government should go into business on the side of any special group, but government should see that all have an equal chance, and that is not the case now. Big business has never shown its impotency more than it has this year and the past two to handle such a situation. During all this time big business has not offered one constructive measure to bring us out of this period of depression, and they came at the beginning of the Congress appealing to the country and to the Congress to help them bolster up their bonds and their finances.

We can not get out of the depression in that way. I introduced some bills providing for public works at the opening of the present Congress, and I am introducing another one this afternoon. I believe we ought to take action along this line as a temporary measure and then begin now to formulate a policy or program to see that such a thing does not happen in the future.

I do not believe it is consistent with Americanism to see our people in this situation. I do not believe in the doctrine of overproduction that we have heard preached so much. We need only to point to the millions who are hungry and poorly clothed to see that it is not a question of overproduction, but is a question of underconsumption.

The great question before us to-day is to restore the purchasing power of our people, and to do this we have come to the place where we should start public works. I regret that we have come to this place by the impotency of those who could have saved us and whose responsibility it was to deal with the matter. I for one believe we should meet it courageously and promptly, and I am ready. [Applause.]

The laboring man is one of our bulwarks of safety in the Republic and when he has the income he never goes on a strike. He always does his part in the purchasing world. If you make the laboring man and farmer prosperous, you always have a prosperous country. If we could to-day restore the loss of wage to our people who work and the income of the person who gets a salary, the goods on the shelves will begin to move at once and the farmer can begin to sell more of his product at a living wage. The person who works to-day, whether he draws a wage or a moderate salary, his interest is directly woven and interwoven with the small business man and the farmer and there is no prospering of one without the other, and the business man's business is founded on the well-being of both groups. Put the farmer and those who work so that they will get their share of the national income and we all prosper, and not until then.

In my judgment, this whole catastrophe could have been averted had there been a better division of income among the masses of people who work in whatever line they may. In other words, capital had appropriated almost all of the benefits of science, invention, and improved machinery, and consequently we had stagnation. To illustrate, in 1899 wages were nearly 25 per cent of commodities manufactured and in 1929 only a little more than 16⅔ per cent.

We are told that from 1920 to 1929 the returns to the capitalist increased 72 per cent, while the returns to labor increased only 13 per cent, and the returns in dividends increased 285 per cent. And again the millionaire classes increased by more than 600 per cent. These conditions bring to our mind more and more the importance of remedying these abuses and the suffering with which we are afflicted to-day. While all these conditions of concentration of wealth were going on into the hands of the few and the laboring man's income was being curtailed in proportion to the income of the coupon clippers and international bankers and promoters, we find the farmer's income going down until to-day the farmer has come to an impossible condition, and we must act on his behalf, and in my judgment if we will give him equal opportunities and remove the discriminations, which is all he asks, he will come again, even though he is now pressed down lower than at any previous time. One step in this program is to restore the purchasing power of our people by giving them an opportunity to work and earn.

We must also lighten the burden of taxation on the farmer and working man, and lighten the burden of debt. These three things can be done and must be done to save America. We should this day pledge ourselves to a solution of these and act now with wisdom and courage in the interest of the great masses of our people.

I introduced on the opening of Congress some bills to help do this and am introducing another to-day which I believe will help alleviate the present crisis in which we find ourselves and do it speedily if enacted into law.

Then I am introducing a bill soon which I believe contains the principle which will prevent a recurrence of these terrible conditions.

I hope this Congress and the administration can and will join nonpartisanly in a program like this and relieve the downtrodden of our country in every walk of life, reaching out on the small farms the working people, the professional and small business people, and then we shall see real prosperity. And if we will to-day enter solemnly on this duty, we can do it, and in this outstanding accomplishment of the century there would be glory enough for all, and our beloved country will return to its ancient ideals, and there will be a reign of prosperity, peace, and happiness through our land that will be reflected in all the world. This is our challenge; this is our opportunity. May we be given wisdom and faith to guide us and courage to sustain us through this trying hour that we may bring our beloved country to its high estate. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, several days ago in another body Dr. Arthur Dean Bevan made the statement before a certain committee that 90 per cent of the doctors of this country are bootleggers. I rise to deny this charge and to read a telegram from a very distinguished member of the medical profession in my home city, Norfolk, Va.:

NORFOLK, VA., February 4, 1932.

HON. MENALCUS LANKFORD,
House of Representatives:

In response to accusation by Doctor Bevan that doctors were bootleggers, I know of very few who even charge for prescriptions. For 10 years I have prescribed without making the first charge. The Government is allowing such inferior liquor to be put out that one can hardly give it away. It is a crime when liquor is badly needed to use such stuff on humans. The graft is in the liquor, not the doctor. Out of justice, please read on the floor.

Dr. JOHN W. WINSTON.

I may say in conclusion that I regard this statement of Doctor Bevan as a slander upon the honorable medical profession, not only of my own city but throughout the country. [Applause.]

The Clerk, reading the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. No person shall in any way use or display the label, brand, mark, name, or other character adopted by any such union or association as provided in section 1 of this act without the consent or authority of such union or association; or counterfeit or imitate any such label, brand, mark, name, or other character, or knowingly sell, dispose of, keep, or have in his possession with intent to sell or dispose of any goods, wares, merchandise, or other products of labor upon which any such counterfeit or imitation is attached, affixed, printed, stamped, or impressed, or knowingly sell, dispose of, keep, or have in his possession with intent to sell or dispose of any goods, wares, merchandise, or other products of labor contained in any box, case, can, or package to which or on which any such counterfeit or imitation is attached, affixed, printed, painted, stamped, or impressed. If copies of such device have been filed, the union or association may maintain an action in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to enjoin the manufacture, use, display, or sale of counterfeit or colorable imitations of such device, or of goods bearing the same, or the unauthorized use or display of such device or of goods bearing the same, and the court may restrain such wrongful manufacture, use, display, or sale, and every unauthorized use or display by others of the genuine devices so registered and filed if such use or display is not authorized by the owner thereof, and may award to the plaintiff such damages resulting from such wrongful manufacture, use, display, or sale as may be proved, together with the profits derived therefrom.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 3, strike out the words "may restrain such wrongful manufacture, use, display, or sale."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to deny the allegation made by my good friend from New York, Mr. LAGUARDIA, that the prohibition law is a failure. How many persons has he seen around the Capitol this morning or to-day under the influence of liquor? Not one.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Nor before prohibition either.

Mr. BLANTON. How many persons has he seen in Washington to-day under the influence of liquor? Not one.

I want to say this to my colleague—I have been here some time; not as long as some, but a pretty good time—I now have to wear glasses, and my hair is turning a little gray since I have been here, but not since January 16, 1920, have I seen a Member of Congress take one drink, not one; 435 Congressmen and 96 Senators. Since the law went into effect I have not seen one Member on either side of the Capitol take a drink; not one. Of course, some may drink, but not here. You tell me that prohibition is not a success. Before that time we had several hundred saloons in Washington, and one right under this House Chamber in the Capitol. Yet you say it is not a success. National prohibition is a success.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The legislation then was just as good as it is now.

Mr. BLANTON. When prohibition was passed there were 300 saloons in this city operating all the time. Just a few years before when the Jones law was passed there were 600 saloons in Washington, and you could not go down town without passing one on every corner. They violated the law every day. When States passed a law against selling to minors, the saloons sold to minors just the same. When States passed a law that they should not sell to drunkards, saloons sold to drunkards just the same. When States passed a law that they should close their doors at a certain hour, they did close their front doors but they sold on behind closed doors until daylight, and that was worse than if they had kept their front doors open.

I want to say that conditions have improved, and you now find thousands of men in every city who on Saturday night go home with their full pay check and give it to their wives for the benefit of their families, whereas they used to waste it in saloons and never take it home. You find them sober back at work Monday morning.

Where is the man who says that it is not a success? Wet politicians only say it. I have watched the attempts for the last week that have been made to hamstring the Attorney General of the United States, to hamstring Colonel Woodcock, the head of the prohibition force, with every kind of a question on earth, attempting to retard their work and keep them from doing their duty. I want to say it is time for men here to support and defend the Constitution, to get up and defend it when it is attacked. I am going to defend it every time it is attacked. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Texas has told the people that all of the 435 Members here are law-abiding citizens.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not say that some of them may not take a drink. But I do say that I have not seen any Member take a drink since January 16, 1920, when prohibition went into effect.

I went to a banquet last Saturday night, one of the finest banquets I ever attended. There were nearly a thousand of splendid citizens of this great city around the festive board. I never saw a drink taken or a single violation of law at that big banquet. These Washingtonians were all high-class men who believe in respecting and upholding the law. While some of them may drink, they do not violate the law by publicly drinking in this city, and I take my hat off to them as splendid citizens who believe in law and order. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMISANO. I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that in my maiden speech here in 1927 I requested the gentleman to offer an amendment to strike out section 29 of the Volstead Act and provide that Members of Congress and of the judiciary and the district attorneys who are convicted or acquiesce in violation of the law should be impeached. The gentleman has not introduced that amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I have introduced House Joint Resolution 83 and have it right here to do that very thing. It is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, and I want the gentleman from Maryland to help me pass it. My Joint Resolution No. 83 provides that it shall be cause for impeachment and removal from office and dishonorable discharge from the service and discharge from Government employment, respectively, for any executive officer, member of the judiciary, Senator, Representative in Congress, officer or enlisted man in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, or any employee of the Government of the United States, to purchase intoxicating liquors from a "bootlegger," as that term is commonly understood, or to manufacture, sell, or transport intoxicating liquors within, or to import the same into, the United States for beverage purposes, or to conspire with any person to violate the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and laws passed in enforcement thereof. I invite all of my colleagues to read this House Joint Resolution 83 in full. They will find it strong enough to meet all objections. It calls attention to the fact that all of the above have taken a solemn oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States and that they should keep their oath or quit drawing a Government salary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I am sure that every colleague of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] will agree with him sympathetically in his efforts to defend the Constitution of the United States, but defending the Constitution of the United States by denying existing facts does not help very much. What the gentleman says about the saloons in the District of Columbia in preprohibition days is quite true. Now, instead of having the saloons, we have the speak-easies, The gentleman remembers it was not very long ago when he himself was shocked by the revolting conditions exposed by certain newspapermen here showing the flagrant violations of the prohibition laws in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is the reason I say that Mr. Hoover is a wet. If he were not, he would not permit such violations of the law to exist, as he is the chief enforcement officer of the Nation, and the duty rests upon his shoulders to enforce all laws.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I saw the gentleman from Texas as a lone hand force a commissioner out because he was not obeying the law.

Mr. BLANTON. But it had to be forced, did it not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and the gentleman from Texas is just as helpless in attempting to enforce prohibition in the District of Columbia as are all the Army and Navy and other forces of the United States Government in trying to enforce it in a land of 120,000,000 people, when a majority of them are rebelling and want to see it repealed.

Mr. BLANTON. At least I am upholding the arms of the enforcement officers and not pulling them down.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is not upholding the arms of the officers when he takes the floor and denies existing facts and attempts to becloud the issue by saying that the law is enforced in the District of Columbia. I submit to any intelligent, impartial man or woman in the city of Washington who has eyes and knows what is going on whether the law is being enforced in Washington any better than it is enforced in any city in Texas, or in any other city of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. And how about the shooting of these little girls down here, and the man who was killed on Saturday night. We are having murder in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely; the gentleman is right; and it is all the result of gin-crazed people, brought about by prohibition. We never had such conditions before prohibition. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we have had murders and rape and burglaries and robberies and arson and every crime known in the annals of criminology happening regularly in Washington, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Chicago long before we have had prohibition, and when open saloons flourished everywhere. These late crimes were committed doubtless by New York and Chicago gangsters who are absolutely sober.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely; gangsters, criminals, and racketeers who have made money out of prohibition. Those are the conditions we are seeking to eliminate. When the gentleman from Texas takes the floor in defense of the Constitution, in which we all sympathize, at least he should not deny existing, tangible facts, such as he himself enumerates. This question will never be settled until you take liquor and put it under proper Government regulation. At this very moment, when this Congress is struggling with a deficit of $2,000,000,000, when we do not know to what sources of revenue we can turn for taxes, we are permitting hundreds of millions of dollars to go into the pockets of outlaws and violators of the law, criminals who sell poisoned hootch, when instead we should be taxing wholesome wine and beer and putting it under proper Government regulation.

Mr. BLANTON. What is proper Government regulation?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is putting it under license and taxing it and seeing that it is pure and regulating its sale.

Mr. BLANTON. And would they obey that any more than they obey the present Government regulations? If liquorites will not support and obey present Government regulations, they will not obey any others.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course. They will be compelled to.

Mr. BLANTON. Who would compel them? Would the gentleman from New York? Then, at least, we would have some help that we have not now. If we can compel them to obey the gentleman's proposed Government regulations, we can equally well compel them to obey the present constitutional Government regulations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The United States is the only country that has not abandoned prohibition. I repeat—and shouting can not put down existing facts—prohibition is not and can not be enforced. There is just as much consumption of alcohol to-day in the United States as there was 13 years ago, with the difference that a great deal of it is unwholesome, and some of it is poison. It is not taxed; it is not regulated. We have created a criminal class, and conditions are so unbearable that we simply can not continue under the present system brought about by prohibition.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in 1909 the Federal Government alone took in in revenue from the basic industry of liquor, beer, and wine, $483,000,000, which we are losing to-day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that does not take into consideration the license fees paid municipalities and the State excise taxes.

Mr. BLANTON. And I call attention to the fact that the organized liquor traffic has cost $483,000,000,000 in wrecked lives, wrecked homes, wrecked orphans, and wrecked hopes and wrecked ambitions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that was a pro forma amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 2173 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXEMPTION OF BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS FROM BEING ADJUDGED BANKRUPTS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution (S. Con. Res. 15), which is on the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a Senate concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 15

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the President pro tempore of the Senate in signing the enrolled bill (S. 2199) entitled "An act exempting building and loan associations from being adjudged bankrupts," be rescinded, and that in the reenrollment of the said bill the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make the following corrections, namely: On page 1 of the engrossed bill, line 8, strike out the comma after the word "except"; on page 1, line 9, insert a comma after the word "association"; and on page 2, line 5, strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mrs. NORTON on account of illness.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMISSION, GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL

The SPEAKER. The attention of the Chair has been called to the fact that in the passage of the bill (S. 1306) to provide for the incorporation of the District of Columbia Commission, George Washington Bicentennial, some amendments were offered, which will necessitate the change of section numbers. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to change the section numbers accordingly.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the minority leader, is momentarily absent from the floor, but the gentleman is interested in ascertaining if it is not possible to let the so-called "lame-duck" amendment, which is set for Friday, February 12, go over until next week.

Mr. RAINEY. I would be very glad to do that, but the Committee on Appropriations will have a bill ready on Tuesday of next week, and we would like to go along with the "lame-duck" resolution. We can postpone a vote on it until Saturday, but that was the day fixed with the consent of everybody on the floor.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I was present, but it has developed that on account of Lincoln's birthday a great many Members desire to be absent on that day and the following day.

Mr. RAINEY. That was developed on the floor at the time the date was fixed and it was switched around and we put the Private Calendar before that, and I think that date ought to stand in view of the condition of the business of the House. Members ought to be able to get back here by Saturday, and we can wait until Saturday for a vote.

Mr. MICHENER. If that is the situation, why can we not proceed now with the Interior Department appropriation bill. The committee is here day after day, ready to call the bill up. The House meets and adjourns to-day at 3.30, and on other occasions in like manner. It seems to me if that is the situation of the calendar and the program, we should not compel many Members to forego commitments which have been made with reference to Lincoln's birthday and the day following.

Mr. RAINEY. But we had that agreement and the Members had an opportunity to object. I think we had better proceed.

Mr. MICHENER. Of course, the gentleman has it within his power.

Mr. RAINEY. I would rather not change the program now.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 70. An act granting the consent of Congress to the board of county commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio, to construct a free overhead viaduct across the Mahoning River at Struthers, Mahoning County, Ohio;

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1932

(Legislative day of Friday, February 5, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on February 8, 1932, the President had approved and signed the act (S. 355) providing for the participation of the United States in A Century of Progress (the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration), to be held at Chicago, Ill., in 1933, authorizing an appropriation therefor, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2173) to authorize associations of employees in the District of Columbia to adopt a device to designate the products of the labor of their members, to punish illegal use or imitation of such device, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1306) to provide for the incorporation of the District of Columbia Commission, George Washington Bicentennial, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the following concurrent resolutions of the Senate:

S. Con. Res. 12. Concurrent resolution to authorize the Committee on Finance to have printed additional copies of the hearings on sale of foreign bonds or securities in the United States; and

S. Con. Res. 15. Concurrent resolution to correct certain errors in the reenrollment of the bill (S. 2199) exempting building and loan associations from being adjudged bankrupts.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 149) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River at or near The Dalles, Oreg., and it was subsequently signed by the President pro tempore.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REPORT OF THE ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of section 6 of the trading with the enemy act, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the Alien Property Custodian on proceedings had under the trading with the enemy act for the year ended December 31, 1931.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 9, 1932.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram from William Shea, of New York City, N. Y., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram]

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 9, 1932.

Vice President CURTIS,
Washington, D. C.:

Discontinue Herculean efforts to stabilize unless Whitney and his crowd are prevented from nullifying same. Examine statistics, January 30, short sales and known tactics in first week of February drive against agricultural interests, granger railroads, and farms supply companies. In last week more Case threshing machine sold than total floating supply. Is this liquidation or short selling? Committee of both Houses get on the job.

WILLIAM SHEA.

Mr. BYRNES presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the general assembly of the State of South Carolina, memorializing Congress to call upon the President to designate a day on which the people of the Nation shall meet in their respective places of worship to ask the Supreme Being for divine guidance through these perilous times, which was ordered to lie on the table. (See concurrent resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the President pro tempore on the 2d instant, p. 3061, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF FOREST-RESERVE GRAZING FEES

Mr. CAREY presented two telegrams relative to forest-reserve grazing fees, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram]

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 7, 1932.

United States Senator ROBERT D. CAREY,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the Shoshone Stock Association of Lovell, Bighorn County, we urge passage your resolution proposing 50 per cent reduction forest-reserve grazing fees.

HANS HANSEN,
Secretary-Treasurer, Lovell, Wyo.

[Telegram]

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 6, 1932.

United States Senator ROBERT D. CAREY,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of those cattlemen users of the national forests in the State of Wyoming, the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association urge a 50 per cent reduction in grazing fees for a period of one year. Demoralized markets and the serious conditions confronting cattle growers at this time necessitates prompt relief.

RUSSELL THORP.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented three letters on the silver question, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., January 27, 1932.

Senator BURTON K. WHEELER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read with much interest what you have had to say about the use of silver as money. In this connection, I inclose copy of a talk I recently made before the local post of the American Legion, and hope you will do me the honor to read it, and also to send me copies of all speeches and interviews you have made recently on the subject of silver money.

For your information, I also inclose copies of certain correspondence I have had over a period of several years on this same subject.

Very truly yours,

CHAS. M. DICKSON.

CHICAGO, January 27, 1932.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WHEELER: I have read with interest the recent news story in the United States Daily regarding your views on the question of remonetizing silver. I fully agree with you that such action would be of great benefit to farmers. What we need is a larger volume of money, particularly of basic money, and silver could easily supply this.

I am inclosing herewith a booklet which I recently wrote for the American Farm Bureau Federation on the money question, in which I believe you will be interested.

Yours sincerely,

C. V. GREGORY, Editor.

ELIZABETHTON, TENN., January 8, 1932.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WHEELER: In looking for means of relief in the present situation, it seems a shame some of our supposed leaders will not accept more seriously the suggestions contained in your statement in the press early this week.

As a business man and investor, I know that the continued rise in the value of the gold dollar and the steady fall in the value of everything else in which the people of the world deal is the cause of the present economic and financial crisis, and that until something like the free coinage of silver is put into effect the farmer and the business interests of the world who owe money are bound to suffer.

I write to heartily commend the bill you have introduced and wish I might hope for its speedy passage.

With the season's greetings, I am,

Yours very truly,

S. W. DUNGAN.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, President of the last Philippine Republic and commander of the armies of the Philippines, who took his oath of allegiance to the United States and has faithfully kept that oath and been the friend and adviser of each of our Governors General, has requested me to convey a message to the President of the United States and to the Congress. It came in the form of a cable, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

There being no objection, the cablegram was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANILA, February 9, 1932.

Senator HARRY B. HAWES,
Washington, D. C.:

Please convey to President and Congress the following message: "Association of Veterans of the Revolution, assembled in annual meeting, reiterates its hope that American people and Government, especially the descendants of patriots of American Revolution, will consider time has come to give Filipino people complete control of their affairs and privilege to join great family of free nations. We are not unaware of permanent benefits derived from our association with America. Gratefully our country shall always remember them. We submit that declared purpose of America in coming to Philippines has been fulfilled due to combined efforts of Americans and Filipinos. The controversies which naturally arise out of harmful indetermination of our political status are far from serving the best interests of both peoples and must be ended with definitive solution. Having acquired sufficient experience in handling our national affairs, and in view tempered but determined resolution of our people to face hardships and risks, political and economic, of independent existence, we trust we shall succeed in discharging responsibilities of new situation."

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in the nature of a petition I submit a letter from the Grand Rapids Association of Commerce bearing upon the pending relief bill. It typifies a somewhat extensive Michigan viewpoint, and since other and different exhibits from Michigan have been submitted from time to time by the proponents of this legislation, I ask that the body of the letter be incorporated in the RECORD. I ask similar publication for a telegram, in the nature of a petition, from a prominent citizen of Three Rivers, Mich.

There being no objection, the letter and telegram were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In behalf of the business and professional interests of Grand Rapids, the Grand Rapids Association of Commerce desires to urge your strenuous objections to the Senate bill which would make Federal appropriations for relief of unemployed persons.

In the referendum recently conducted by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States the Grand Rapids Association of Commerce voted full strength in opposition to Federal appropriations for relief, believing that relief should be provided by voluntary subscriptions and local governments.

This organization believes that this question should be settled as promptly as possible, because it has a retarding effect upon local provisions for relief.

Please inform us if there is any way in which we can help to oppose direct Federal relief by appropriation from the Federal Treasury.

A. T. MCFADYEN,
Secretary Grand Rapids Association of Commerce.

[Telegram]

Three Rivers Chamber of Commerce directors voted unanimously against Federal relief for unemployment. As its president and as a business man and newspaper publisher, I earnestly plead against enactment of such appropriation. We all plead for a return to aggressive individualism and call attention to the fact that Michigan communities are caring for relief work, providing employment for needy, and preserving us from influence of miserable dole and the subsequent demoralizing effects on human ability to provide a livelihood. It seems to me now is the critical time to preserve the very elements of substantial ability of each individual to care for himself which has made the United States of to-day.

WM. H. SHUMAKER,
Publisher Three Rivers Daily Commercial.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6304) to transfer Lavaca County from the Houston division to the Victoria division of the southern district of Texas, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 197) thereon.

A bill (S. 3585) relating to the granting of Federal aid to State and Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 3586) authorizing the employment of professional and technical services in the designing, planning, and construction of public buildings; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 3587) to prohibit financial transactions with any foreign government in default on its obligations to the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3588) for the incorporation of the Klamath Indian Corporation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3589) to amend section 321 of title 18 of the United States Code; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3495) for the relief of Capt. Alexander C. Doyle, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT—AMENDMENT

Mr. HAYDEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the so-called Black substitute to the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. JOHNSON (for Mr. SHORTRIDGE) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to House bill 7912, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 80, strike out lines 1 and 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the control and prevention of spread of the European corn borer, including road-patrol work, $."

MERGER OF STREET RAILWAYS IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. TYDINGS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION BY MOTOR CARRIERS

Mr. TYDINGS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2793) to regulate the transportation of persons and property in interstate and foreign commerce by motor carriers operating on the public highways, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION—ARTICLE BY ELLIOTT THURSTON

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Elliott Thurston on the political situation, appearing in the Philadelphia Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COALITION RULE IN WASHINGTON—PRESIDENTIAL YEAR PRESENTS PHENOMENON OF REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION WORKING OUT PROGRAM WITH AID OF DEMOCRATIC LEADERS—PROGRESSIVE SCHEMES TO SPEED ECONOMIC RECOVERY AND RELIEVE HUMAN DISTRESS VIRTUALLY SCRAPPED AS "ENEMIES" STAGE LOVE FEAST IN DRIVE TO AID BIG BUSINESS AND REGAIN SOME FORM OF PROSPERITY—HOOVER'S "REELECTION STOCK" SCORES GOOD ADVANCE—LIBERALS IN CONGRESS SEE NEED OF NEW PARTY

By Elliott Thurston

WASHINGTON, February 6.—In practice if not in theory the country is witnessing, for the first time since the early dawn of the Republic, a coalition form of government.

How long it will continue, what its political effects will be are questions apart from the phenomenon now presented of a Republican administration working through Democratic leaders. It is the more striking in the year of a presidential election, when normally the two major parties are drawing up their lines for battle fought out with blunt and frank partisanship.

DEMOCRATS AIDING HOOVER

Ever since the present session of Congress began and the Democrats took over control of the House with JACK GARNER as Speaker, Democratic policy has tended more and more to coincide with President Hoover's policy. The Democrats have offered no program of their own, either as to unemployment relief, economic rehabilitation, taxes, farm problems, the tariff, or other major questions now of pressing importance. Instead they have adopted the Hoover program and, with minor and unimportant alterations, pressed it forward more vigorously and certainly more effectively than even the Republican leaders.

The political prophets who, without exception, predicted a winter of congressional storm and violent opposition to the ultraconservatism of the Hoover administration have been proved wholly mistaken, or, rather, it has become a matter of the utmost surprise that the Democratic forces, triumphant in the elections of the past two years because of their battling against Hoover, have now suddenly fallen into step behind him. It is unquestionably a source of greatest gratification to Hoover and his political associates, who are making bold once more to raise the picture of the "superman" and to take complete and exclusive credit for the program put through solely because of Democratic collaboration.

Only the progressives have put forward a separate and independent program, but they are helpless against the huge majority represented by the combination of Hoover and Democratic forces. Their program is doomed to be snowed under.

A continuation of the present coalition will mean an extraordinary triumph for ultraconservatism at an hour when new ideas, new forces, progressivism, and outright radicalism are claiming the attention of a depressed and disillusioned public. It is more than passingly curious that at such a time these forces have no spokesmen, no champions in Congress, except among a small minority of progressives, who are powerless against the Hoover-Democratic combination.

DEMOCRATS REWARDED

Peering behind the scenes of the coalition it is easy to discover that the chief figures in the combination are being rewarded as if they were members of the administration. It is no mere coincidence, certainly, that President Hoover should have named as director for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, by far the most important emergency creation of the administration, two eminent Democrats who are closely allied with the Democratic leaders of the Senate and House. The two appointees referred to are Harvey Couch, of Arkansas, public-utility magnate, whose interests the law firm of Senator ROBINSON, of Arkansas, Democratic leader of the Senate, has long represented, and Jesse Jones, wealthy and influential Texan, who virtually underwrote the Democratic convention of 1928 and is a potent figure in the political affairs of Speaker GARNER'S State.

Another eminent and wealthy Democrat, long influential behind the scenes, who figures prominently in the creation of the Reconstruction Corporation, with its $2,000,000,000 reservoir of Government supplied or supported funds, is Bernard M. Baruch, of New York, who has for months been an intimate, confidential consultant of Hoover's, and is often in Washington for private conferences with both ROBINSON and GARNER.

OTHER PLANS SCRAPPED

It is not suggested here that ROBINSON and GARNER made any deal or trade with Hoover whereby in return for their cooperation in putting through the Hoover program they were to be rewarded by the extremely important patronage connected with the Reconstruction Corporation. It is a fact, however, that Hoover happened to choose for places upon the limited directorate of this all-powerful governmental agency, Democrats, who, respectively, are closer to and have more influence with the Democratic leaders of Senate and House than any others one can think of offhand.

It is a fact that Senate Leader ROBINSON, of Arkansas, finds upon this all-important directorate his own patron and political supporter, who is dominant in Arkansas political affairs, while Speaker GARNER, of Texas, finds on the directorate the Texas Democrat who has exerted more influence in the past in party affairs than any man from that State since the days of Colonel House.

The fact that these influential Democrats are given places upon the directorate has many implications entirely apart from suggestions that Hoover awarded patronage to the Democratic leaders in gratitude for their support of his program. For one thing the creation of the corporation becomes the central factor in the program for economic rehabilitation as long as the Democrats accept it as the primary and major step.

Having so accepted it, the Democratic leaders necessarily brush into the discard all other measures or proposals, including the entire progressive program, which is based upon the theory either that the Reconstruction Corporation is inadequate or that it is merely a boon to big business, or that it will be ineffective in relieving fundamental economic troubles or human distress arising from unemployment.

Once the Democratic leaders agreed to adopt the Hoover Reconstruction Corporation as the central factor in a relief program, measures for stimulation of public-works programs, for direct or indirect aid to the unemployed, for outright doles, or for economic rehabilitation through deliberate currency inflation, suspension of the gold standard, and, in fact, all other theories or methods of dealing with the emergency went overboard. The Democratic leaders have, in fact, already frowned upon such bills as the Costigan-La Follette measure to appropriate $375,000,000 for relief of unemployment and human distress.

HOOVER'S CHANCES AIDED

Senator ROBINSON has not come out directly against this measure, but indirectly he has exhibited hostility toward it. He has discussed with Hoover leaders the possibility of having it sent back to committee, which Senator BORAH pointed out would mean its death, or of changing it so that it would provide for restricted loans to States, perhaps under such terms that it would become inoperative if ever enacted into law.

All this is a matter of gratification to ultraconservative interests of the country as well as to Hoover and his political associates. Presumably the Democratic leaders have entered this coalition with Hoover upon the theory that it will curry favor with big business and eastern conservatives. Yet there are Democrats in the Senate and House who fail to comprehend the wisdom in this attitude. They feel that the Democratic Party, by following along obediently in Hoover's wake, is sacrificing its chances of winning the next presidential election, that it is disappointing the masses of the people who have plainly enough exhibited their dissatisfaction with the Hoover administration whenever they have had a chance to go to the ballot box in the past two years. They believe that these masses would turn with relief to a third party which offered a concrete, definite program based upon progressive principles in contrast to the ultraconservative doctrines pursued by Hoover and the Democratic leaders.

However right or wrong they may be, the fact remains that Hoover's political fortunes have begun to look much brighter as the Democrats have subordinated themselves to him and accepted his program without offering one of their own.

The present session is already two months old. It comes to an end in time for the Chicago conventions in June. Not as yet have the Democrats, despite creation of a joint committee on policy, contributed one single item to a program of their own, save perhaps the incidental measure designed to abolish the President's powers under the flexible provision of the tariff.

And this, after all, is more or less an academic matter having but a remote bearing on the vital question of the exorbitance of tariff rates and their demoralizing effect upon foreign trade, upon European recovery, and upon payment of the foreign debts, both war debts and private debts. In other words, so far as the tariff is concerned, the Democrats have dismissed it with this subordinate measure and have made no move to achieve some degree of parity between industrial and agricultural tariffs or to treat the subject broadly in the light of international economic effects.

NO ACTION ON FARM RELIEF

Similarly, on the questions of taxes and economy, the Democratic leaders, while professing to be outdoing Hoover in paring down the Budget and in adjusting new taxes where they will be least onerous, have offered no program of their own, but have accepted what Hoover has handed to them and then gone to work to make minor alterations or improvements, of which purpose he has cordially approved. No attempt has been made by the Democrats to approach the tax question from the broad standpoint of the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few, but, on the contrary, Senator ROBINSON early in the session proclaimed himself opposed to levying taxes with the purpose of bringing about a more equitable distribution of national wealth. Only relatively few progressives have tackled the question from this standpoint, and they are, as previously pointed out, impotent.

Similarly, the Democrats have offered no program for farm relief, but have apparently acquiesced in the administration's desire to perpetuate the Hoover Farm Board and let the farm-relief program go at that, despite the proven ineffectiveness of the board to better the demoralized condition of agriculture.

As for unemployment relief, the Democrats have proposed nothing save acceptance of the Hoover measures, theoretically drawn to aid big business, with the idea or hope that business will then reemploy the millions now walking the streets in futile search of jobs. No immediate help for these distressed millions is contemplated at all.

All this is not to say that the Hoover program is right or wrong, adequate or inadequate, or that another program would be better or worse, but simply to bring out the extraordinary state of affairs in which as a presidential election approaches the Hoover administration is able to win the support of Democratic leaders of Senate and House, to suppress and exterminate a rival program, dissenting measures, and to exercise a domination of a supposedly hostile Congress more completely than he was able to control when his own party was in the majority in both branches.

RANK AND FILE MAY REBEL

It is surprising, an unexpected development, which is causing the greatest apprehension down through Democratic ranks. The rank and file out of a sense of party loyalty and cohesion are following the leaders, who in turn are following Hoover, but many of the marchers in the ranks are uneasy, the more so as they see Hoover's political boosters, like Secretary of War Hurley, Secretary of Agriculture Hyde, and other Cabinet and administration officials rushing to the stump to take full credit for the course of events so far.

How long this union, this coalition, between the Hoover administration and the Democratic leadership will continue depends largely upon how much rebellion wells up from below in Democratic ranks, how much the public exhibits signs of impatience or disgust with this merging of rival forces.

It is being recalled that last winter, when Leader ROBINSON threatened open rebellion against the White House over the drought relief bill, Hoover sent hurriedly for Harvey Couch, the utility magnate, who in turn went into solemn and secret session with ROBINSON, and that immediately thereafter ROBINSON agreed to a compromise, which ended the danger both of Federal aid for victims of unemployment and of the extra session of Congress which Hoover sought at all costs to avoid.

It is also being recalled that for many months now Baruch has been so frequent a visitor to the White House, so constant a consultant with Hoover upon major policies, that gossip has awarded him a rôle equal to that played by House in the Wilson administration, or the silent Frank Stearns, of Boston, during the Coolidge régime.

It is worthy of passing political note that these Democratic key figures who are collaborating closest with Hoover are aligned with the "Stop Roosevelt" movement.

It is a strange political line-up thus presented. It has gone so far that one can hear grumblings among Old Guard Republican leaders because from their viewpoint Hoover finds them less important to deal with than the Democratic leaders, who have become closer to him than his own party chiefs.

It would have to be set down as a tribute to Hoover's magical political skill were it not for his repeated demonstrations of political ineptitude heretofore. It scarcely seems possible that almost overnight he has discovered the secret, learned the art. Rather it is more plausible that some other reasons, factors, and motives are behind the Democratic policy, behind their coalition with an administration whose unpopularity with the voters had given the Democrats control of the House, virtual control of the Senate, and promised to give them the Presidency in the next election. If the motive is to cater to the conservatives, to big business, with idea that these forces will desert Hoover and accept a Democratic President nominated by the Democratic Party leaders responsible for the coalition, then its political wisdom has yet to appear.

At the present time the effect has been to give new heart to Hoover's political henchmen, to send them out on the stump with rapidly reviving confidence, to obscure the Democratic Party, and to puzzle the voter who is yearning for new leadership, new direction, for vigorous action to bring about economic recovery, and to provide meanwhile for the millions of Americans in dire distress.

THE JAPAN-CHINA SITUATION

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] last Saturday night over the radio on the subject of the Japan-China situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT Without objection, it is so ordered.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, OF MINNESOTA, ON THE JAPAN-CHINA SITUATION, FEBRUARY 6, 1932

I am delighted to speak to you this evening at the invitation of the Columbia Broadcasting System. I have been asked to discuss the Sino-Japanese question and the question of whether or not international treaties have been violated. I will say in the beginning that I do not intend to sit in judgment upon the acts of nations. I will content myself with giving you some idea of what the treaties involved are and will leave to you the decision as to whether or not the treaties have been violated.

I hope I shall be able to explain these treaties and their bearing upon the controversy in such plain language that all can understand.

China is a country of vast natural resources, valuable harbors, and a population three times that of the United States. China has never been a militaristic nation. The great powers of the world have at various times during the last half century obtained under treaties vast concessions. China claims that many of these treaties have been obtained by the threat of force if she did not yield. Under these treaties various nations have to a large extent dominated the domestic and international policies of China for years.

The Boxer Rebellion came as a result of an uprising of the people against foreign domination. The Japanese-Chinese War of 1894 was fought over Korea, which was Chinese territory. At the end of the war China ceded the peninsula of Liao Tang and the island of Formosa to Japan and paid an idemnity of $110,000,000 During the Boxer rebellion the Russians had occupied Manchuria and forced the Chinese Government to grant concessions. The Russian-Japanese War of 1904 was fought to drive Russia out of Manchuria. After that war was over China transferred to Japan the leases that she had earlier been obliged to give to Russia. Concessions were obtained for the exploitation of China by the German, French, and British Governments. In fact, there seemed to be a general understanding among the great powers that China was legitimate prey to be divided among them, and this division was limited only to the extent to which they could agree.

In protest against the exclusion of Chinese laborers from the United States boycotts were declared against American goods. This and the fact that concessions obtained by European nations in the Far East threatened to wipe out American trade in China led Secretary of State Knox in 1909 to call to the attention of the world powers the American policy of the open door as first enunciated by John Hay, Secretary of State under McKinley. The principle of that policy in short was that the United States demands that China should have an open door to trade by all nations on a basis of equality.

When the Bolsheviks took charge of the Russian Government after the World War and published the secret documents in the Russian archives we discovered that Japan and Russia had made secret treaties for the division of China for exploitation, one in 1907 and the other in 1909. The archives also show that England and France had been informed of the secret treaties and approved them. On June 28, 1909, Count Benkendorff, Russian ambassador at London, wired Iswolsky, Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, as follows:

"Grey is very much satisfied with the step taken by the Russian Government and requests me to forward to you his best thanks. He has watched with satisfaction the development of good relations between Russia and Japan within the last years and is extremely satisfied by the confirmation of his observations as furnished by you."

I am giving you a few details of history to furnish a background against which to view present-day events. The present is always easier understood if we remember the past. In 1915, during the World War but before China entered it on the side of the Allies, Japan obtained certain treaties from China. China claimed that Japan obtained these treaties under duress and came to the peace conference at Paris with a request to her allied powers that these treaties should be invalidated. This the powers refused to do. In 1919 and 1920 the Chinese people boycotted Japanese goods, as a result of which negotiations were entered upon by Japan to give back to China Kiachow, which she had taken from Germany during the war.

In 1925 the Chinese people started a boycott against British goods as a protest against what they claimed undue interference of the British in Chinese affairs. For the past year the Chinese people have again made effective a boycott against Japanese goods. Japan within the last few months has operated with armed forces in Manchuria, claiming it was necessary for her to do so to protect the lives and property of Japanese citizens. China appealed to the League of Nations, of which body China and Japan are members. When the nations became members of the league they signed a treaty in which they agreed that if any trouble arose individual members of the league had the right to call the matter to the attention of the league for settlement. They also agreed that if there should arise between them any dispute that was likely to lead to a rupture they would submit the matter either to arbitration or inquiry by the council, and they further agreed they would not resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council. Under article 16 of that treaty they agreed that if any member should resort to war against a member of the league it should be deemed to have committed an act of war against all members of the league, and in such case all the nations agreed that they would immediately sever all trade or financial relations with the offending nation, and they would prohibit all intercourse between the citizens of the treaty-breaking state and the other members of the league. In such event they agreed further that the council of the league would recommend to the various governments concerned what military, naval, or air force the members of the league should contribute to the armed forces that were to be used to enforce the agreement made in the treaty. The members of the league also agreed that they would mutually support one another in financial and economic measures which would be taken under this article against the offending nation.

The League of Nations ordered troops to be withdrawn forthwith, and this Japan refused to do, and the league then decided to appoint a committee to investigate the matter further. In doing so the league must have been in doubt as to Japan's guilt of an act of war, otherwise they would have put into effect that provision of the league where they promise to come to the assistance of the party attacked. If that was not the reason for their refusal to invoke military assistance as provided for in the league covenant, their refusal to do so must have been on the ground that they did not care to enforce the league covenant in behalf of China. This is not an unreasonable assumption.

The governments members of the league have their right foot in their home foreign office, and their left foot in Geneva, and sometimes the right foot does not travel in the same direction as the left. The home government may have aims and policies in conflict with their obligations to the league. Home governments may also have made secret agreements inconsistent with their pledges to the league. And in view of that possibility, and in view of their past diplomatic history, that may explain why the League of Nations failed to act more vigorously to enforce its treaties in the present controversy. As long as the disturbances were confined to Manchuria, European governments seemed to have acted listlessly if and when they acted at all. However, when the Japanese attacked Shanghai, where the various governments have huge concessions and populations, European governments have manifested greater interest. They have acted since the attack upon Shanghai more vigorously, not as members of the league but as individual sovereign nations, anxious to make it plain, however, that they consider that the United States shall take the lead.

On numerous occasions the so-called nine-power treaty has been called to the attention of Japan. This treaty was signed by nine powers and four other powers have since adhered.

NINE-POWER PACT

"ARTICLE I. The contracting powers, other than China, agree: (1) To respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China;

"ARTICLE VII. The contracting powers agree that, whenever a situation arises which in the opinion of any one of them involves the application of the stipulations of the present treaty and renders desirable discussion of such application, there shall be full and frank communication between the contracting powers concerned."

When this treaty was called to the attention of the Japanese and Chinese Governments Japan replied that this treaty was out of date due to present conditions in China. She had from the beginning claimed that she is there to protect the lives and property of her citizens.

Both China and Japan are signers of the Kellogg-Briand treaty. Articles I and II of the text of that treaty provide:

"The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another."

"The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means."

While this treaty provides that the parties to the treaty renounce war as a means of settling international controversies the interpretations of the text as revealed in the correspondence before the nations signed the treaty reveal that they agreed before signing the treaty that it did not deprive any nation of the right to make war in self-defense. They also agreed that every nation had the right to decide for itself whether a war in which it participated was a war in self-defense or a war of aggression. Since Japanese and Chinese both claim that they are fighting in self-defense and each in the correspondence interpreting the treaty has a right to decide that question for itself it is difficult to see how the treaty has been violated.

This may seem rather confusing to most of us, but these are the treaties written by diplomats, interpreted by diplomats, administered by diplomats, with the result that while treaties may have been violated no competent authority has to this day so decided. As a matter of fact, war has not been declared, but certainly fighting is going on. The difficulty of the situation is that while the various governments have a keen desire for peace they also at times desire something else, such as territory, trade routes, harbors, oil fields, raw materials, and areas for exploitation. When the time comes that they desire these things more than they desire peace and if these things can not be obtained by peaceful methods, we sometimes have war. As long as the peoples of the earth permit their governments to pursue policies that lead to war so long can we have no assurance of peace.

After the World War was over we discovered that secret treaties and agreements had been made between the fighting nations dividing up the earth among the victors. These secret treaties had been made by allied nations on both sides of the controversy. We now know that that war was a commercial war. If we could be informed of what are the actual desires, policies, and aims of the great powers in the present controversy over China, and if we could find out what secret understandings and agreements, if any, have been made or are being made by the various nations at the present time, we would understand the problem more clearly. Then it would be easier for us to predict future events.

In the meantime the Government of the United States is trying to protect our nationals and establish peace. Certainly we have no intention of entering a war concerning China. Certainly we can not follow the policy of going to war from time to time for the benefit of trade or for the purpose of saving this country or that foreign country. We have sufficient experiences in that regard.

China has a population of 450,000,000 people, vast natural resources, and they have in their own country and their own people inherent power to protect their own interests. If they fail to use these resources in their own defense when attacked, they can not expect us to squander ours in their behalf.

It is a strange paradox to contemplate that while we are still in the shadow of the last great war, with its death, misery, and debts, the nations of the world, with the exception of Germany, have not disarmed as they agreed to do when they signed the treaties of peace. In spite of loud protestations and peaceful intentions the nations of the world are still armed to the teeth and eager for the conquest and the loot of war. Sovereignty and justice still occupy different spheres. The law of conquest is international law. No nation has so far, in spite of peace treaties, had the courage to denounce it, and so long as the nations of the world subscribe to that law so long international relations are controlled by the law of the wolf pack, the law of the jungle, the law that says, To the strong, the swift, and the cunning belongs everything he has the power to take. The best example of this is the treaty of Versailles.

While nations have agreed to renounce war as a national policy, they have agreed that war for self-defense is all right. Under the guise of self-defense wars of conquest can still be carried on. Nations still adhere to the principle that to the victor belong the spoils. As long as nations desire the loot and spoils of war more than peace we can have no assurance of peace.

FEDERAL AID FOR UNEMPLOYMENT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BULKLEY

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very excellent address delivered by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] over a nation-wide radio hook-up last evening, discussing the pending measure relating to Federal aid to unemployment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT J. BULKLEY, OF OHIO, ON FEDERAL AID FOR UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, FEBRUARY 8, 1932

There is pending in the United States Senate a bill presented by Senators LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, and COSTIGAN, of Colorado, to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment. This bill authorizes the appropriation of $375,000,000 to be distributed among the States, partly in proportion to population and local emergency relief contributions, and partly by allocation in proportion to needs by a Federal board of administration created by the bill. This board would be authorized to prescribe the methods and personnel to be used by the States in the distribution of funds allocated by it and would have power to revoke allocations if, in the opinion of the board, the allocated funds were not being properly used.

A Democratic substitute to this bill will be offered, differing not at all from the La Follette-Costigan bill in the underlying purpose to relieve suffering and hardship nor in the amount made available—$375,000,000—but differing fundamentally in the placing of responsibility for the relief and its administration, and adding an additional $375,000,000 to relieve unemployment by employment.

The substitute provides for loans to the States rather than for direct contributions from the Federal Treasury. Under it a loan may be made to any State upon the certificate of its governor that the amount of the loan is necessary for emergency relief, and that it can not be otherwise obtained. The proposed Federal aid will be available only upon such representation by a governor, and it is, therefore, clear that the Federal Government will not be called upon at all except in cases of real necessity. Since many States are prevented by legal and constitutional limitations from borrowing, we recognize that it is not practicable to require from a State a repayment agreement which would be legally binding, and so we require only that any governor asking this aid shall pledge himself to do what he can by way of recommendation to the legislature and to the people of his State that advancements made to meet this emergency shall be repaid. This moral obligation may be discharged by actual payment by the borrowing State, or by a deduction in the future from such State's share of Federal aid for highway construction.

I am invited to speak to-night in support of this substitute and the Democratic attitude toward Federal cooperation in the relief of unemployment and suffering. I have been chosen for this task because I have collaborated with Senators WALSH, of Montana, and BLACK, of Alabama, in the preparation of the bill which I have just outlined, and which will be offered as a substitute for the so-called La Follette-Costigan bill. This substitute was prepared under the direction of the Democratic steering committee and the Democratic policy committee of the Senate and has been approved by those committees.

Why should there be a substitute? A short statement of the Democratic principles involved in this question will make apparent the necessity for proposing a substitute bill. We believe that the existing crisis is a national calamity and that the Federal Government has an obligation to help in relieving the incidental distress. We believe that Federal relief must be made available whenever necessary to prevent starvation and suffering. Federal aid, however, should be only a last resort. Responsibility for direct relief of the needy must always be primarily a local responsibility, and this principle must be always insisted upon throughout this great emergency. Not only must there be local responsibility for providing such relief, but there must be complete local authority in its administration and distribution, and our viewpoint is utterly opposed to the domination of local relief administration by any board or bureau in Washington. Finally, Democratic Senators want the opportunity to vote for a measure which has a chance to become law in time to relieve existing distress, and therefore want to have a bill which can be approved by the President rather than to create a futile political issue with him.

Our substitute is preferable to the La Follette-Costigan bill for four outstanding reasons:

First, because it provides work in addition to relief;

Second, because it does not provide a dole nor a gift nor an invitation to relaxation of local effort, but it does make available substantial sums as loans to States wherever the needs justify such help;

Third, because it gives the States the right to administer the relief through those experienced agencies which are already handling the situation, without any bureaucratic red tape and Federal domination of local administration; and

Fourth, because it avoids a direct invitation to a presidential veto by avoiding the La Follette-Costigan provision for the giving away of Federal money to displace what ought to be raised by local responsibility.

The proposed substitute is sponsored by Democrats, approved by the Democratic policy committee and steering committee, and has been supported by a clear and able public statement by the Democratic leader, Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has therefore been called a Democratic substitute, yet there is in it nothing of partisanship; and its underlying principle of insistence upon local responsibility for direct relief is the reaffirmance of an accepted American principal rather than a partisan Democratic one. The respect which we have shown to President Hoover's recently expressed views on this subject should commend our substitute to our Republican colleagues, and there is reason to hope that many of them will join in supporting our substitute bill.

The economic dislocation is without any precedent. It is indeed a paradox that there should be hunger, want, and dire need in this land of wealth and plenty, and yet we have that picture plainly before us and we can not turn our eyes away. Testimony of competent witnesses before the Senate Committee on Manufactures demonstrates beyond a doubt that in countless communities throughout the Nation there will soon be a disastrous shortage of funds to meet the most urgent necessities in the care of the destitute. After private charity and local taxing units have done their utmost, there is still not enough in sight to carry through the year.

None of us can fail to wish that conditions were not so. None of us can fail to hope that they will not remain so long. But notwithstanding this, none of us can yet see clearly the way out of this economic dislocation nor state with confidence when we may be able to find and follow that way.

In the meantime there can be no difference of opinion that the hungry must be fed and that human suffering and dire want must be, so far as possible, alleviated. That this can be done with complete fairness and efficiency we can not hope; we can not hope that it can be accomplished without mistakes, without some measure of waste; nor can we hope to get through the crisis without some impairment of morale and self-respect on the part of those who are obliged to accept charity; without some measure of imposition practiced by a minority who are willing to take unfair advantage of a distressing situation; nor without some important exceptions be made in the strict application of the theories of our economic and political philosophy.

What we must seriously consider is how we may best meet this difficult and unprecedented task, facing the unwelcome facts just as we find them, using, as we must, existing political and social agencies, with such faults as they have, and endeavoring to accomplish the task with the greatest possible efficiency, the least possible waste and loss of morale, and with the least possible sacrifice of governmental principles which have long proven sound.

Of course, the true remedy for unemployment is employment. The substitute bill recognizes this by setting up a greatly expanded program of road construction, making Federal contributions to the States for this purpose without requiring that they be matched by State appropriations, and providing that the work on highways thereby authorized shall be done in such manner as to use the maximum amount of human labor consistent with economy, and further providing that those now unemployed shall be given preference in employment on such work. The provisions of our program in respect to this road work are in line with the policy established for the Federal Government by the Wagner Act, providing for carrying forward necessary and desirable public works as rapidly as possible during times of general unemployment. This wise policy having been established by the Federal Government, we submit that now is the time to put it into practical effect. And there can be no doubt that the practical effect of a large expenditure on road work will be to aid very substantially in mitigating the prevalent unemployment and distress.

In order that the benefits of this program may be equitably spread and may reach to the great metropolitan communities where the unemployment situation is most severe, we provide, by way of exception to the general provisions of the Federal highway act, that the funds which we now propose to make available may be expended upon highways, streets, or bridges within the limits of municipalities.

It is obvious that the soundness of this proposed step, which is nothing more than making presently effective a policy already declared and established in Federal law, will be strenuously attacked from two opposite directions. It will be contended that the expenditure of $375,000,000, even spread over a period of 18 months, will be an impossible strain upon the resources of the Federal Treasury, and that it will be difficult for the Government even by the sale of bonds to realize the funds necessary to carry out the program now proposed. It may well be admitted that a deficit in the operations of the Federal Government is to be deplored and that at the present time it is sufficiently difficult, even with the greatest economy, to avoid a substantial deficit. It should be remembered, however, that there is a sound distinction between expenditures for current expenses of Government, on the one hand, and on the other hand expenditures for capital improvements, such as the highway program contemplates.

The present method of bookkeeping at the Treasury is such that the stated deficit will be enhanced by the amount spent upon the proposed road program. But the consoling fact remains that however the Treasury books may be kept, the highways constructed will remain as a valuable asset to the people for many years after their cost may have been written off by the Treasury.

Some will, of course, urge that it is extravagant and wasteful to perform at this time work which is not urgently required, and by so doing increase the national debt, which the taxpayers must ultimately pay. It seems a sufficient answer to call attention to the plain fact that whatever bonds may be sold will be bought and held within the limits of our own country, and from the point of view of national wealth it is but a bookkeeping transaction to note that the Government is indebted to certain of its citizens who hold its bonds; whereas nothing can be more wasteful than to hold in idleness millions of capable and willing workers whose lost time can never be recovered. This wastefulness of workers' time is far more than an economic loss; it must result in such disheartenment and impairment of self-respect as to constitute a real and irreparable moral loss to the Nation.

To the extent that we succeed in justifying the increase of the public debt at this time to provide employment on public works, we expose ourselves to the opposite criticism, namely, that the amount proposed to be expended will not be sufficient to provide employment for any considerable proportion of those who need it. It is no doubt true that the expenditure of $375,000,000 will not be sufficient, of itself, to provide employment for all who are unemployed. Yet there can be no doubt that it will be a solution of the difficulty for many of those now idle, and no one can say how great may be the indirect benefits growing out of the increased purchasing power and moral encouragement of those who will be directly employed on the proposed works. It is impractical to dream of ending our unemployment crisis by any one measure, yet that should not cause us to fail in showing the courage to do whatever will be substantially helpful.

There are limits to the possibility of planning the expenditure of vast sums on public works, and it would seem the part of wisdom to test the practicability as well as the economic effect of the expenditure of $375,000,000 before committing ourselves to any larger program which might unduly strain the already difficult position of the Federal Treasury.

The provision of a considerable amount of employment either on public works, or in any other manner, will, of course, relieve measurably the necessity for charitable relief to the hungry and destitute. It will diminish the number of those needing relief not only by the number actually securing employment, but will take out of that class also their immediate families and, to some extent, other relatives, as well as those whose business will naturally be improved by the increased spending power of those employed. But we can not hope that any such program will relieve the necessity for an unprecedented amount of help to the needy for many months to come. By no means all of the unemployed have yet reached the stage of requiring charitable relief, and so the provision of additional employment may avert the necessity for such applications in the future, and to that extent it will not result in direct decrease in the number now being cared for. At best, there will be many, many thousands who will require direct relief, and this is the more apparent when we remember that many of those now receiving relief will be incapable of performing efficiently the jobs to be provided on road work. And besides there must still be a shortage of jobs for months to come.

The need of greatly increased sums to provide direct relief, and the danger that such necessary amounts will not be secured through private or other local charity, or even State aid, has been abundantly demonstrated.

We believe well justified the conclusion as to the extent of the emergency reached by Senators LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN and their committee, and supported by the testimony of many reputable and well-informed witnesses, both before the committee and by correspondence. While we would not wish to discourage or hamper any State or local effort made to meet the deplorable conditions, we believe it is clearly shown to be unsafe to rest the whole situation on the outcome of such efforts. The service performed by Senators LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN in assembling this important testimony and making the whole country conscious of the dangers of the situation is a notable one, which will not be forgotten.

It is much to be regretted that the able Senators, whose splendid efforts have focused the country's attention upon this vital subject, which so well deserves attention, should have insisted upon making available the necessary relief in a manner contrary to the best American principles. Though we disagree with the method they propose, we think they should be commended for the diligence and ability with which they have assembled the mass of evidence which so clearly shows the seriousness of our situation, and they also deserve full credit for complete sincerity in their belief that a new Federal board, with the assistance of the Children's Bureau, would be capable of instructing and leading into better methods all of the tried and experienced State and local charitable welfare administrations in the land.

No doubt these distinguished Senators will have considerable support among sincere and well-informed people for the view which they have expressed that our efforts to provide by a substitute bill for what we believe to be more sound and acceptable principles represent nothing more than quibbling over technicalities. On our side we can not admit that the differences are technical. To us it seems vital that the principles of local responsibility for direct relief and local authority in its administration must be preserved.

There are Senators who sincerely desire to make Federal funds available for this extreme emergency who nevertheless will not vote for the outright gift provided in the La Follette-Costigan bill, believing as they do that it extends practically no help to the needy but only finances a relaxation of local effort to perform a local duty. There are also Senators who can never bring themselves to believe that a Federal board should be empowered, as it would be by the La Follette-Costigan bill, to withhold relief from the starving in some locality because such a board might disapprove the manner in which local agencies might function. And there are many who believe so far in the sincerity of the President's reiterated statements in opposition to Federal gifts for direct relief as to think it is a foregone conclusion that the La Follette-Costigan bill as presented to the Senate must necessarily be vetoed. A presidential veto will make a campaign issue but will not feed the starving. It is, of course, true that the President has given no advance assurance of approval to the substitute now proposed, but he signed last winter a bill providing for Government loans to farmers in drought-stricken areas, and a similar provision was carried in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, recently approved. It, therefore, seems clear that there is nothing in the principle of Government loans in necessitous cases that would necessarily lead to a presidential veto.

In conclusion it is submitted that the substitute bill provides a generous measure of relief through Federal funds when such relief is absolutely necessary, and provides that under such circumstances relief may be obtained with the greatest simplicity and promptness. The substitute bill, so far from tearing down the tradition of complete local responsibility, further insists upon that sound principle to the utmost practicable limit. It maintains also the sound principle of local freedom and authority in administration and it is not inconsistent with official acts and public pronouncements of the President. It will command sound Democratic support, yet it is not a partisan proposal. We expect that it will be opposed by all who are opposed to Federal aid in any form, and it may be defeated if these opponents are aided by the immediate following of Senators LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN. It is to be hoped, however, that either these Senators, who have done so much toward securing needed Federal aid, will see the futility of standing on what they have themselves characterized as technical differences, or else that we may, even without their help, get enough votes to carry forward the work which they have so well begun and secure the enactment of a law that will make available Federal funds to relieve distress, if Federal funds should ever be necessary for that purpose, but only if that necessity should be clearly established.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that the emergency which confronts the country calls for Federal aid for the relief of the needy, there can remain no doubt in the minds of anyone who has read even cursorily the hearings on the pending bill or the persuasive arguments made in support of it by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], indorsed in that regard by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] on yesterday. I shall spend no time, accordingly, in discussing the need of aid, but content myself with expressing my views as to the form which that aid should take.

It is my view that the occasion calls for an expanded program of public works by the Federal Government. That course is being pursued by practically every unit of government. Practically every city in the country is putting men to work in order that they may be relieved from becoming objects of charity. Practically every county is doing the same thing. The States are doing the same thing. I can see no reason at all why the Federal Government should not pursue a like policy.

That course is being pursued, as I have indicated, in the first place in order to relieve from utter destruction the morale of a large portion of our people, to preserve and protect them from degradation which is incident to the receipt of alms, and then the communities and the governments representing them feel that, as they are obliged to do something toward relieving suffering, they ought, if possible, to get something in return for the relief extended.

Before coming here last fall my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] and I made a tour through a section of Montana that for the third season is suffering from extreme drought. The drought which afflicted a great portion of the country last year has been continued in that section of our State with unabated fury. Wherever we went the people said, "Give us something to do; give us some work at which we can earn wages." The Governor of Pennsylvania, appearing before the committee holding hearings upon this measure echoed the same sentiment. He told the committee that on a tour through his State the cry everywhere was "Give us some work; give us something to do; give us some jobs."

It occurs to me, Mr. President, that the same obligation rests upon the Federal Government. An effort is being made to escape that responsibility by characterizing any effort whatever toward relief of the needy as a dole. The bill now under consideration is thus characterized about the dinner tables of the city of Washington to-day. No matter what form it takes, it is stigmatized by being denounced as a dole.

Some few years ago practically every effort that was made by anyone for the correction of hoary, old abuses in our economic and industrial system was characterized as bolshevism. For years in Great Britain as well as in this country the public has been called upon to contribute toward the care of the needy through the public purse; poor rates are not a new thing in Great Britain; they have been known for centuries; but the dole is quite a different thing. The dole is a system under which payments are made to the unemployed by the week or by the month or the day, as the case may be, whether they are actually in need or not. No one proposes anything of that kind anywhere in this country, so far as I have heard. It is proposed to supply only the needy with aid.

In order to escape these responsibilities, Mr. President, it may be news to learn that in the preparation of the Budget for this year, as the Director of the Budget tells me, no consideration whatever was given to the necessity of providing work for those who were in need or were unemployed. Last year the Congress was moved to create a fund of some $106,000,000 for that purpose, but in the preparation of the Budget for this year the condition of unemployment throughout the country was not an element that was considered at all, and, as the Director of the Budget advises us, because it was not known that at the time the appropriations would become effective at the beginning of the next fiscal year, the 1st of July, there would be any occasion for help to the unemployed. The fatuous idea that "prosperity is only around the corner" still seems to obtain in that branch of our Government.

Having in mind, Mr. President, that the problem ought to be met by an expanded program of public works, I introduced, early in the session, a resolution calling upon the Employment Stabilization Board to send to the Senate a schedule of projects that are in contemplation by various departments during the next six years, with, so far as possible, an estimate of the cost of those projects.

The report which came in obedience to that resolution shows that Congress has already authorized public works contemplating the expenditure of $993,456,570. Those are projects which have already been authorized by Congress; a survey has been made of them; an estimate of the cost of carrying on the work has been supplied, and the necessity and the advisability of making the improvements has already been passed upon by the Congress. The principal items making up the aggregate amount are road construction, flood control, reclamation, rivers and harbors, and the erection of public buildings. I have felt, however, that with respect to quite a good many of these projects the money would be expended only locally. For instance, any expenditures on flood control would be made chiefly in the States along the Mississippi River. Reclamation work would be carried on only, of course, in the Rocky Mountain region and on the west coast. Public buildings would be erected in various places and would afford some relief in the particular localities in which they were constructed.

Road construction, however, is a class of public work that would be spread all over the country; no section of the country would be exempt from the vivifying influence of an extensive road program. Accordingly, Mr. President, that was suggested as a very appropriate means of bringing much-needed relief to the various communities; not that anyone thought that it would meet the situation at all, but the burden upon the local communities, the burden upon community chests, upon county funds, upon city funds, would, of course, be lessened to whatever extent relief was extended through the work program.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator about how much of the $993,000,000, to which he has referred, would be spent during the present year on the projects enumerated?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The resolution of the Senate requested information as to how soon operations could be undertaken on each project that should be reported. And the report indicates that in the case of most of them work could be done either immediately or within from two to four months from the time the appropriation was made available by the Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The question asked by the Senator from Tennessee was the very one I wanted to propound to the Senator; but, as I understood the question, the Senator from Montana has not answered it. Regarding the survey which shows that something over $993,000,000 was to be expended on various projects, the Senator from Tennessee asked—and that is the information I should like to obtain—has the department information that the Senator can give us as to how that $993,000,000 is divided as between the various projects?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And between the various years. In other words, what I wanted, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him further, was to find out how much of the $993,000,000 of work to be done did the executive department expect to be done or how much had they recommended to be done this year?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no recommendation as to that, so far as I know. The projects are summarized by the various departments. For instance, in the Department of Agriculture projects are authorized to the extent of $246,515,735, of which $113,879,088 are for road work and $131,055,197 are for forestry service work.

Mr. NORRIS. Does that mean roads within forests?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That includes everything under the forestry bureau.

Flood control is represented by $213,460,100; rivers and harbors by $194,725,171, and so on down the list.

Mr. NORRIS. How much for public buildings?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For post offices $16,357,200, and for Federal office buildings $1,125,700 in addition, an aggregate of about $18,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. Can the Senator tell us whether or not the $993,000,000 cover items beyond those requested in the current Budget for inclusion in the current appropriation bills?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, many of these items are not covered in any appropriation bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I took pains to find out how much is included in the appropriation bills for this year for what I may call capital investment, and I found that the amount is $377,000,000. That does not include moneys which are appropriated to be used until expended. So I assume from what the Senator has said that the $993,000,000 would be beyond what might be called permanent improvements provided for in the current Budget.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not say as to that. I am inclined to think that not a considerable sum of the appropriations the Senator speaks of are included in the total of $993,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say to the Senator that from a survey that I was able to make I reached the conclusion that more labor would be employed, scattered more widely over the country, by the inauguration of road-building projects than by any of the other projects. With that in view I introduced a bill on the subject. I have been informed, however, by a good many Senators with whom I have talked that my conclusions were wrong and that road-building would not give employment to labor as much as some of the other projects would.

I should like to ask the Senator if he has any information and can give us an idea about the amount of employment of labor that would result from the different kinds of projects.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not able to give the Senator any information concerning these other classes of projects; but the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] yesterday gave us information from the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads to the effect that 85 per cent of all money appropriated for public roads goes either directly or indirectly to labor.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I was not present yesterday.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me say in that connection that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] the other day called attention to the fact that of the entire appropriation for road construction, 14 per cent went to labor; but that was the payment to labor employed directly. For instance, a large portion went for transportation, but, of course, the transportation employed labor; and we are informed by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission that something like 65 to 70 per cent of everything that is spent for transportation carried on by the railroads goes to labor. So, directly or indirectly, the chief of the bureau figures that 85 per cent of every appropriation made for road construction goes to labor.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to add, if the Senator will permit me, that those figures bear out the brief studies I was able to make on the subject. I had in view only the taking up of projects, first, that would be general in their distribution over the country; and, second, that would give as much employment as possible to labor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. As material to that inquiry, let me say that it depends on how the money is utilized. While 85 per cent of this money is estimated to go to labor, that may be greatly increased by the manner and the plan under which it is expended.

For instance, take the funds that are being expended in the little town of Las Vegas, Nev., where there are about 4,000 idle men waiting to get the jobs of 4,000 employed men working on the Boulder Dam project. This little town naturally found it very difficult to support those men there; so they are doing their street work, alley work, and sewer work on a kind of progressive plan. They do not contract it, but they take the list of unemployed, and they will take one group of them for five or six days and pay them, and then they will take another group for five or six days and pay them. Wherever they can do pick-and-shovel work, although it is possibly not as economical as doing it with large tractors and steam shovels, that is being done; and it may be utilized with much more advantage than if the prime object is employment.

In this bill we have made an exception to the Federal highway act. There it is expressly provided that the money shall not be used in municipalities; but as there is so much unemployment in municipalities, the provisions of this bill have been extended to the construction and reconstruction of streets, alleys, bridges, culverts, and other appurtenances to highways in municipalities.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. I think it might be helpful at this point to call attention to the fact that in the year 1930 automotive freight on railroads exceeded 3,330,000 carloads, divided as follows:

	Carloads
Motor vehicles, parts, and tires	618,483
Gasoline	1,330,000
Iron and steel	132,700
Coal	66,000
Crude petroleum	60,000
Lubricating oil	50,000
Lumber	31,200
Crude rubber	13,000
Asphalt for roads	43,000
Brick (vitrified)	50,000
Cement for roads and bridges	236,000
Gravel, sand, and stone for roads	650,000
Miscellaneous, such as nonferrous metals, paints, and upholstery materials	50,000

Making a total of 3,330,383 railroad carloads of freight.

From these figures we can easily estimate the enormous quantity of labor employed in the road-building and automotive industries in the United States, and in the transportation of the products of these industries on the railroads.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was about to say that some such system as that referred to by the senior Senator from Nevada is being quite generally observed in the employment of labor throughout the country for the purpose of relieving the unemployment situation. In some places it takes one form and in some places it takes another.

The mayor of Grand Rapids appeared before the committee holding hearings upon this bill and told of the system that was observed in his city. They utilized a very large number of men, utilizing machinery only to a very limited extent; and, according to his contention, the work was carried on more economically than though it was contracted to a large contractor who would employ powerful machines in the work.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the statement made by the Senator that 85 cents of every dollar goes to labor is very conservative, because in a recent conversation with the commissioner of public works in my State he said that the proportion was 90 cents out of every dollar. He spoke about quarrying stone for making cement and the coal needed to burn that mixture; and so when the dollar was analyzed he was quite convinced that 90 cents of every dollar for road building really goes for the payment of labor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], to whom I referred a few moments ago, the other day objected to the road-construction feature of the substitute that is offered for the pending bill upon the ground that the program could not be set in operation for some considerable time after it was authorized. That matter, however, seems to be quite completely covered by the testimony of Mr. MacDonald, the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads only a few days ago. I read from the hearings on Senate bill 36, as follows.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Page 74:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. MacDonald, we do not know, of course, what Congress will do in the way of appropriations, but assuming Congress provided approximately what was provided last year for road work, could the number of men who were employed in that program last year be profitably put to work this year?

Mr. MACDONALD. It would be possible. I testified before the Senate it would be possible to do the same amount of work done last year. In the first six months of 1931 a program, Federal-aid program, was started, of $256,000,000, and that employed during the peak months just a little short of 400,000 men. I have the statement of employment by months, if you desire it in the record.

I pause here to remark, before proceeding further, that, of course, when 400,000 men were thus taken out of employment there were just 400,000 men less to be taken care of by the local charity organizations or by the local governments.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it would be wise to put that in the record.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will submit that statement by months, covering both State and Federal aid projects, and men employed on maintenance work. The employment on maintenance and betterments takes less money to provide labor than construction work, requiring material. About $128 per man month is required on maintenance and betterment work, and the larger the construction program that is carried through with the Federal-aid funds, the more betterment and maintenance work can be carried on by the States.

Senator HAYDEN. When you say a program of $256,000,000 was undertaken last year, and you say that it could be continued at about the same rate this year, do you mean by that that the State highway departments in cooperation with the Bureau of Public Roads have worked out plans in such detail that work could proceed immediately to that extent?

Mr. MACDONALD. That would be my judgment; yes, sir.

Senator HAYDEN. Have the State highway departments generally anticipated the future in the way of making out plans for new road construction this year to a greater extent than they did last year?

Mr. MACDONALD. There has been more pressure on the State highway departments this year to find work. There is more work this winter, for example, than last winter, meaning that we are partially exhausting our funds for winter work, and will not have them during the summer months when ordinary labor is being used to the greatest extent.

Senator HAYDEN. I am sure it is the desire of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to authorize no expenditure except when assured that use will be made of the money immediately to put the men to work. Is it your opinion that Congress could repeat this year what we did last year and be sure such was the case?

Mr. MACDONALD. It is my judgment that a program equal to that of last year could be carried out.

Senator HAYDEN. Do you estimate that such a program could be increased to a material extent?

Mr. MACDONALD. It could be increased to some extent by letting larger paving contracts, but that takes the money proportionately more rapidly than it gives direct employment. Because of the stringency of the financial situation, Federal and State, we should try to employ more labor with less money, and that is going on now. I think more labor would be employed with less money this winter; for example, Mr. Dillman, of Michigan, testified as to the number of men they had employed by providing for hand labor, doing the winter bridge work and work of that character, and by requiring more hand labor, we could probably increase it—it is not economical to do paving work with hand labor.

So that it appears from the testimony of Mr. MacDonald that work could proceed immediately when the appropriations are made.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. But Mr. MacDonald is only talking about the amount of the appropriation last year. The Senator is discussing the matter on the idea that only two things are necessary to build roads. I think there are three that must be considered, and it is the third about which I should like to have information.

We must have labor; we must have money; but there is one other thing that is absolutely necessary, and that is experienced or trained engineers. When we reach the point where we do not have the engineers to supervise the work, we can go no farther without wasting our money. What about the trained engineers that are available?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The good roads act was passed in 1916; and I had assumed that long before this time every State had some kind of a State highway commission, and that long before this time it had at its command engineers adequate to do the work with which it is charged, both by the Federal and by the State Governments. There would be no difficulty whatever about getting engineering service in the State of Montana.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very true. They can do the work; for instance, they may be prepared to spend $20,000,000 a year; but if we increase that by four or five millions I think some of the States would have great difficulty in finding engineers to supervise the work.

In my own State we have been forced to go outside of Kentucky and employ engineers in other States, because we did not have them in the State; and of late we have had some difficulty in securing them. I do not know how it is just now. Not having been in close touch with the road situation for the last four or five years, I am not positive about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had supposed that the general depression had affected the engineering profession just about the same as it had every other line and that engineers were looking for jobs.

Mr. LOGAN. That is probably true, Mr. President. I just wondered if the Senator had any direct information on that point.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I have not.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I might add for the information of the Senator from Kentucky that there was testimony before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads that this year, 1932, had seen a greater number of engineers out of employment than at any other time since road work began in the United States. With the programs that have been carried on heretofore, there has been a gradual increase in the number of trained engineers capable of carrying on that work. There has been, however, a rapid drop in road work this year, which is best illustrated by the fact that the Federal Government paid out to the States in 1931 $244,000,000 in Federal aid, whereas in 1932, this year, the testimony of the chief of the Bureau of Public Roads is that there will be available only $130,000,000. That shows clearly upon its face that there will not be as many contracts let, and consequently many engineers will be out of employment. The talent is here to carry on the program proposed in the substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not quite understand what was the Federal Government's proportion of the $256,000,000 of work that Mr. MacDonald testified could be done this year, as it was appropriated for last year. Was it $80,000,000? Was that the Federal Government's part?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will remember that in addition to the general appropriation of $125,000,000 there was an emergency appropriation of $80,000,000, three million for forest trails, and three million more, making eighty-six million, in addition to the $125,000,000, as my recollection serves me now; so that that made something like two hundred million or a little over. He speaks about a $256,000,000 program, so that I assume that this includes only the contribution of the Federal Government to which he refers here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I notice that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] stated that Federal aid to the extent of $80,000,000 last year resulted in a total of $256,000,000 worth of road work in the several States. I was a little confused as to whether he referred to the $80,000,000 as the Federal Government's portion of the $256,000,000 concerning which Mr. MacDonald was testifying or whether he had omitted some part of the Federal Government's portion of that in giving the figures of $80,000,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. The total payments to States under Federal aid of all kinds in the calendar year 1931 was $244,000,000. Of that amount $80,000,000 was an emergency appropriation which could be used by the State to match Federal aid. That explains the statement made by Mr. MacDonald that by the use of this $80,000,000, which may be available to the States from other Federal funds and from their own funds, it made a total expenditure of about a quarter of a million dollars. That was the effect of it. But the $80,000,000 is only a part of the total sum paid out by the Federal Government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, as I understand it, this $256,000,000 which is being discussed on pages 74 and 75 of the hearings is the Federal Government's portion of the contribution. Does the Senator have any information as to how much the States spent in connection with carrying out that program?

Mr. HAYDEN. The total State expenditures were much over a billion dollars.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I mean on Federal-aid highways systems alone.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think that statement is still correct. The State expenditures have always been more than double the Federal expenditures on Federal aid. But the point to be made in connection with the pending amendment is that there exists in each State a well-equipped, efficient State highway department which is perfectly capable of taking any such sum of money we are prepared to appropriate and using it immediately on road work. There is no question about the engineering talent or the organization. Everything is there to do the work, and they have made advance plans whereby contracts can be immediately advertised for and let, so that the work can be carried on in the most efficient manner.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, quite a number of gentlemen giving their attention to public-welfare problems associated themselves in an organization called the steering committee of the Social Work Conference on Federal Action. They examined quite carefully into this matter of road construction as a measure of unemployment relief and have prepared a rather interesting report. I send to the desk and ask that there be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a list of the gentlemen thus associated.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMBERS OF THE STEERING COMMITTEE OF THE SOCIAL WORK CONFERENCE OF FEDERAL ACTION

Linton B. Swift (chairman), executive secretary Family Welfare Association of America, New York City; Benson Y. Landis, secretary, National Country Life Association, New York City; Frank Bane, director, Association of Public Welfare Officials, Washington, D. C.; Howard S. Braucher, secretary, National Recreation Association, New York City; Allan T. Burns, executive director, Association of Community Chests and Councils, New York City; C. C. Carstens, executive director, Child Welfare League of America, New York City; Joanna C. Colcord, director, charity organization department, Russell Sage Foundation, New York City; Miss Helen Crosby, Family Welfare Association of America, New York City; John A. Fitch, professor of industry, New York School of Social Work, New York City; David H. Holbrook, secretary, National Social Work Council, New York City; Paul U. Kellogg, editor the Survey, New York City; H. L. Lurie, director, Bureau of Jewish Social Research, New York City; Rev. Dr. John O'Grady, secretary, National Conference of Catholic Charities, Washington, D. C.; and Walter M. West, executive secretary, American Association of Social Workers, New York City.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They appointed a subcommittee to prepare a report on the subject, and that committee's report I have here. The committee consisted of Prof. John A. Fitch, of the New York School of Social Work; Benson Y. Landis, secretary of the National Country Life Association; and the Rev. John O'Grady, of the Catholic University of America, with the assistance of Otto Mallory, of Philadelphia, who always has given much study to this subject.

The report is somewhat lengthy, but it is so powerful in its arguments and so informative in the facts related that, at the risk of being tedious, I shall undertake to read it to the Senate. It is as follows:

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS OF THE STEERING COMMITTEE ON UNEMPLOYMENT AND FEDERAL AID

ROAD BUILDING AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

It is a well-recognized fact that an enlarged road-building program offers the best opportunity for the employment of labor during the depression. The estimated expenditures for rural highways for the calendar year 1930 were $1,610,569,000, and the expenditures for 1931 were $1,644,917,000. The estimate for 1930 includes $105,648,000 of Federal funds. The estimate for 1931 includes $259,897,000 Federal funds, an increase of $154,000,000 over 1930.

I think that gives the figures about which the Senator from Wisconsin asked. There is there given the aggregate amount, and the contribution made by the Federal Government.

Labor has received a greater amount of benefit from road work during the past two years than for any other form of public work. When Congress made available its increased Federal-aid appropriation and the special emergency fund for road building the States availed themselves immediately of the larger funds, and there was a steady increase in the number of men employed on Federal and State road programs from 148,600 in January, 1931, to 365,000 in June. In view of the fact that for every person employed directly in road work at least two other persons are employed indirectly by industries supplying and transporting road material and equipment, it is perfectly safe to assume a total of 1,095,000 were given employment in road work by Federal-State road projects last June. The influence of road construction on the employment of labor becomes very apparent when we compare the above figures with the estimate of 45,000 employed directly and indirectly on Federal public-building projects.

Note, Mr. President, that there were 45,000 employed on building projects; 1,095,000, either directly or indirectly, on road work, 365,000 being employed directly on road work.

FORECAST OF 1932 STATE AND LOCAL ROAD-BUILDING PROGRAMS

Federal, State, and local road-building programs have been a large element in unemployment relief in the country during the past two years. The increased Federal appropriation of $50,000,000 and the special emergency fund of $80,000,000 satisfied a most useful purpose in enabling the States to carry on and to a limited extent to expand their programs. As a matter of fact the increased Federal appropriation did not mean a proportionate increase in the total road-building program of the country. It brought an increase of only $34,000,000, which meant a drop of $120,000,000 in State and local expenditures for this purpose. Information on hand indicates a further falling off in State and local expenditures for next year. The following States estimate that there will be a decrease in their State road funds in 1932 over 1931: Alabama, Arizona, Florida, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, and West Virginia. The following excerpts from letters received within the past month from heads of State highway departments are indicative of the conditions in a few States. The State highway engineer of South Carolina writes: "I am afraid that the present outlook for highway construction work in this State during the coming winter is not so encouraging. Until now it has, I believe, aided materially to help relieve unemployment, but no new construction contracts of any consequence have been awarded since August 30, and those are nearing completion along with all previous contracts. It appears to me that unless the money market and the general financial conditions of the State improve considerably within the next month or so this department will be unable to sell any more bonds in time to get additional construction work under way before spring, unless, of course, the Federal Government makes some appropriation to the State for such work in addition to the regular Federal-aid allotment."

The chief engineer of the State highway commission of Iowa writes: "The highway funds available will not permit us to put on any special program for these winter months. Very little highway work of any kind is being done by the cities and towns in this State, other than purely maintenance work. Street improvements in cities and towns in this State are paid for by special assessments against abutting and adjacent property. Under present economic conditions owners of adjacent property are not willing to have additional assessments levied against their property. The counties may carry on a small amount of bridge work during the winter. However, their highway funds have already been depleted by contracts let in the interest of relieving unemployment, so that they have little or no funds available with which to carry on any special winter program."

The chief engineer of the Kansas Highway Commission writes: "This department finds itself confronted with the necessity of working along in line with its construction income. Just now our whole construction activities are on the downward trend, due to the closing of last year's contract season and the necessity that we do not start our new construction work until we have the finances."

LARGER FEDERAL PROGRAM NEEDED

When Congress appropriated its $80,000,000 emergency roads fund last year to aid the States in matching the regular Federal-aid fund it provided that the emergency fund should be repaid out of the Federal-aid allotments over a period of five years. This would leave approximately $130,000,000 to be allocated to the States for 1932.

In order to make the same contribution as last year for road work within the States, the Federal Government will have to add an emergency fund of $124,000,000 to the regular Federal-aid fund of $130,000,000. However, in order to maintain last year's pace in road building, the States will need a much larger amount of Federal aid.

PROBABLE DECREASE IN LOCAL TAX RESOURCES

It has already been noted that there was a falling off of $120,000,000 in State and local road expenditures last year. The chances are that there will be a further falling off next year. The cost of local road construction and repair comes largely from taxes on real property and the sale of bonds. There is bound to be a considerable decrease in income from these two sources next year. The cost of State road construction comes from the motor-vehicle license fees, gasoline taxes, and Federal aid. There is a tendency to divert the gasoline tax and the motor-vehicle fee to other purposes in order to decrease taxes on real property. In order to maintain the same pace in road building as last year, the States will therefore need an increased Federal-aid appropriation. The increase might be taken care of by a further addition to the emergency fund. If, as in all probability will be the case, there should be the same falling off in local and State receipts for road construction, the sum of $116,000,000 should be added to the emergency fund to take care of this decrease. The total emergency fund this year should, therefore, be $240,000,000, which, added to the regular appropriation of $125,000,000, would make the total Federal-aid appropriation $365,000,000.

The emergency appropriation for this year would be on the same basis as the appropriation of last year. It would be repaid out of future Federal-aid appropriations. It was specified that last year's emergency fund should be repaid over a period of five years. It would be well to extend to 15 years the period for the repayment of this year's emergency fund. No State would be under any compulsion to avail itself of the emergency fund except it desired to do so. It is simply intended for those States that desire to maintain the same pace in road building as last year and can not secure the funds in any other way.

In an address before the American Association of Highway Officials at Salt Lake City September 29, 1931, Mr. Thomas H. McDonald stated: "In five months the $80,000,000 advance fund, together with $160,000,000 regular Federal-aid and State funds, totaling $240,000,000, had been put under way on wholly new work to provide employment in all the States. * * * Had it not been for the $80,000,000 emergency Federal appropriation for 1931 the total of the year's construction program would have fallen off by very much more than the amount of this fund for two reasons: First, a number of the States, because of the accelerated program of the preceding year and for other causes, were not able to meet the regular Federal aid in full; and, secondly, the proceeds of bond issues in a number of States which had helped to swell the construction program for 1930 were exhausted." A result of the emergency fund was to bring the Federal-aid program to the same point on May 30 as had been reached at the end of September of last year. There is, therefore, good reason for believing that a much larger Federal aid and emergency fund could have been used to good account. If the regular Federal-aid and emergency funds had been obligated in five months, the chances are that twice the amount could have been obligated before the end of the year. There is a question, however, as to whether additional funds over and above the amount necessary to maintain last year's pace in road construction should not call for a more flexible arrangement than that required by the present highway act. Why should not these additional funds be used in promoting State and local projects not provided for under the existing Federal-aid program.

EMERGENCY STATE PROGRAMS

A number of States have given special thought to unemployment relief in their road-building programs. They are planning certain types of road work that can be widely distributed. In some States consideration is given to the relief needs of different communities in the distribution of road work. The States that are planning road work as part of their programs of unemployment relief are giving special thought to the types of work that can be carried on during the winter months. An effort is being made to adjust the program to the needs of larger cities as well as the smaller cities and the rural communities.

Among the States that are giving special thought to road programs as a measure of unemployment relief are Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, New Jersey, Delaware, Oregon, and Nebraska.

On August 15 the State of Pennsylvania added 20,000 miles of township roads to its highway system. Construction work was started immediately on 1,700 miles of roads in 66 counties of the State. Work was also begun this fall in the reconditioning of 5,000 miles of road taken over by the highway department. The construction of the 1,700 miles is carried on by departmental forces as a part of the unemployment relief program of the State. A total of $67,000,000 will be expended by the State highway department in the fiscal year 1931–32. There is no limit to the amount that could be used in reconditioning and building rural highways in the State. The secretary of highways of Pennsylvania believes in extending road expenditures over a broader territory rather than in concentrating on a limited mileage of high-class road. "We want more roads," he contends, "rather than a few high-grade roads."

The Highway Department of Pennsylvania cooperates with the various local relief organizations in the relief of unemployment. In this connection Governor Pinchot has issued the following instructions to the secretary of highways of the Commonwealth: "You and I have discussed a number of times the question of unemployment relief in connection with the construction of roads. * * * The policy on which we have agreed and which I should like to have enforced at once by special order to highway superintendents in each county is as follows: I want the construction of highways under this administration and under the great need for work to result not only in producing roads but also in relieving the distress of many people, especially in the country, who are willing to work but who are without work and unable to get it. I want the neediest cases given first consideration. By that I mean men with large families dependent upon them. Since the engineers and superintendents of the highway department are necessarily less familiar with needy cases in each county than the local unemployment committee or other residents, it would be well to direct your men to confer with local advisers in selecting the worthy cases." In a great many cases it has been impossible to care for all the requests for employment. Under such circumstances the work is staggered so as to give employment to a larger number of men.

That, as we were told by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], is the case on the Boulder Dam work.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not on the Boulder Dam work, but in the town of Las Vegas.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Incident to the Boulder Dam work.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I continue reading:

"Despite the volume of work distributed throughout the State (which would have been greater had funds permitted) cases of dire distress were reported," writes the secretary of highways, "and the department took another step for relief. Two and three day shifts were inaugurated where conditions seemed to warrant this, aiding twice the number of families." A foreman who chose to disregard the "neediest-case instructions was dismissed." In October the highways department employed 22,000 men directly. In its rural-highway program it can maintain a steady pace during the winter months. Its only limitation will be the limitation of funds.

"In order to provide winter unemployment relief for approximately 30,000 workers," writes the State Highway Commissioner of Michigan, "this department is rapidly placing under construction a $10,000,000 winter road-construction program consisting mostly of grading, drainage structures, grade separations, and bridges. In order to insure that the work as specified shall be carried on this winter the department has estimated the amount of each contract that can be carried on during the winter and is requiring that the contractor shall have the percentage as estimated completed on or before April 1, 1932.

"The department is including in the special provisions set up in the proposals that a definite amount of equipment be used, stipulating some work for hand labor. * * * In order to provide the maximum number of men with work the department requires that to the fullest extent possible all employees on State highway projects shall work part time either three days a week or alternate weeks. In connection with employment it is specified that the contractor shall employ not less than 75 per cent of all labor used on the work from lists of unemployed furnished by the State employment commission through its local committees and that a minimum wage of 35 cents an hour be paid.

"Projects are being placed as far as possible according to the urgency of the need for unemployment relief. While all sections of the State are being granted a portion of the work the need for relief is most acute in the southern part of the Peninsula."

The sum of $10,000,000 looks very big, but it is very small when we compare it with Michigan's unemployment problem. A conservative estimate places the number of unemployed in Michigan on November 1, 1931, at at least 350,000. Of this number 119,000 are in the city of Detroit, and the balance scattered throughout the State. Over 103,000 families were receiving assistance from public funds in October, 1931. The chances are that this number will increase over 25 per cent before January if the experience of 1930 can be taken as a guide. Eighteen communities in the State have indicated that their local funds will be insufficient to meet their needs, and 62 communities have indicated that great difficulty will be experienced in meeting relief needs this winter.

On September 1, Ohio initiated a three and one-half million dollar bridge program as a winter relief measure. "Our efforts," says the chief engineer of bridges of the State, "have been to select projects which were very deserving in light of the traffic needs and at the same time so locate the same as to provide employment where most needed. * * * The outstanding feature of specifications will be mandatory winter construction with completion by specified date. * * * The labor situation will be handled through local nonpartisan relief committees, with whom the contractor will be bound to cooperate, paying a minimum wage which varies from 35 cents for the bulk of the counties to 50 cents in Cuyahoga County."

The maintenance department of the New Jersey State Highway Commission has endeavored to make its work a part of a State relief program for unemployment. The number of men employed in the maintenance department has been increased from 700 last year to 2,000 this year. It is planned to increase the number to 3,000 during the winter months. The commission has been able to meet the limitations placed upon it in regard to the use of its own forces for construction work by having the work done directly by the maintenance department. In carrying out its winter program, hand labor will be used as much as possible. Men will be employed on recommendation of the local relief committees and the State relief director. When necessary, the work will be staggered. With larger funds, it is believed that the New Jersey program could be extended very greatly. If the funds were on hand the present State highway system could be extended. The State highway commission would then be in position to carry on the same type of program as Pennsylvania.

The chief engineer of the State Highway Department of Delaware writes: "Our department is taking active measures to help relieve unemployment during the winter, particularly in the vicinity of Wilmington. We are letting out several grading contracts close enough to the city to use city labor which otherwise would not have been let until spring, or possibly for another year or two. * * * We are letting one contract for 110,000 cubic yards of borrow to be done by hand labor with an additional specification requiring this labor to be staggered with a 50 per cent turnover each week. * * * I find it difficult, however, not to look forward to our position next fall when, with so much work started early in the season, our funds will probably be exhausted. We are, however, issuing a million dollars' worth of bonds to take care of this emergency work."

The Indiana State Highway Commission has undertaken a limited roads program as a measure for unemployment relief. About 190 small jobs of road widening, straightening curves, and changing grades are being carried on this winter. As a part of its program the commission has added about 945 miles of road to the State highway system. The number of men employed by the maintenance department of the State highway commission has been increased from 1,851 on November 1, 1930, to 4,504 on November 1, 1931.

Oregon and Nebraska have launched special State-road programs for unemployment relief. Oregon has floated a $2,000,000 bond issue for the construction of rural roads. Nebraska has launched a road-building program as a relief measure in its drought-stricken area.

A SPECIAL EMERGENCY FEDERAL FUND RECOMMENDED

The road-construction programs developed by a number of States in aid of unemployment relief do not come within the purview of the present Federal-aid system. The terms under which the Federal Government aids the States in road building limits the Federal aid to 7 per cent of the rural-road mileage. In Pennsylvania, with its ninety-odd thousand miles of rural roads, this would mean that Federal aid could be granted for about 6,000 miles. If the Federal Government has assisted in building a road it can not assist in rebuilding it. By reason of the limitations of the present system of Federal aid for road building it would be well to have a special emergency fund to encourage the promotion of special road projects by the States directly or by the States and local communities.

It has been assumed that the emergency appropriation already recommended will be merely sufficient to maintain the same pace in road building that was reached last year. Over and above the projects developed last year there is a large amount of work to be done not only in improvement of rural roads but also of those close to the city that could be promoted by a special emergency Federal appropriation. This appropriation should be matched by State and local funds. A special advance might be made to those States that were unable to match the Federal appropriation. The present State programs point the way to the most effective use of the Federal emergency fund. The States are distributing their emergency road work in such a way as to reach the communities in greatest need. They are undertaking a type of work that requires a maximum of labor and the type of work that can be undertaken in the vicinity of the large cities.

Due to financial limitations the State highway departments are not making as large a contribution in aid of unemployment relief as they would desire. A number of States have closed down their road work for the winter. Even the States that are going ahead with special winter programs recognize that their funds are not equal to the task set before them.

Road work has been our best and most useful method of providing employment during the depression, and it offers our best hope in lifting the load of unemployment. It represents a safe and sound investment of funds. Its usefulness will be limited only by our willingness to invest our funds in it. Road work does not require the same long-time planning as other forms of public work, notably public buildings. At least there is sufficient work ahead in the reconditioning of rural roads and the making of our highways safer for travel to employ usefully all the money we are willing to expend for these purposes for a long time to come.

If Congress desires to make road building an effective means for providing employment during the depression there are two things it must do. First, it must see that road building is maintained at the same pace as last year. This will require an emergency appropriation of $240,000,000. Secondly, it should add a special emergency appropriation of $240,000,000 for special road programs carried out by States and local communities. This last amount would mean an average of $5,000,000 per State for special road programs. It would mean from ten to twelve million dollars in States like Pennsylvania and New York.

Mr. President, in view of what this record shows concerning work being carried on by the various States to aid unemployment, I repeat that the obligation is upon the Federal Government to do its share.

Governor Pollard, of the State of Virginia, having the same views, communicated with the governors of all the States for the purpose of ascertaining their attitude concerning an extended road-construction program. I have here a summary of the replies received by Governor Pollard from the governors of a large number of States, which I ask may be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator would not be willing to read the summary. We are always interested in anything Governor Pollard does.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to do so. It reads as follows:

DIGEST OF THE REPLIES OF OFFICIALS OF VARIOUS STATES TO THE LETTER OF GOV. JOHN GARLAND POLLARD, OF VIRGINIA, WITH REFERENCE TO A PLAN FOR ALLEVIATING UNEMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS THROUGH THE ADVANCE OF FEDERAL AID ROAD MONEY TO THE STATES

ARIZONA

Gov. George W. P. Hunt states that the plan as proposed by Governor Pollard would be extremely helpful in Arizona. He suggests that to be valuable the aid should be forthcoming promptly.

Hon. C. E. Adams, chairman, Arizona Highway Commission, indorses the plan, and states that, in his opinion, there should be a further addition in the fact that this money that is to be made available should be 100 per cent Federal aid and portion of this money that is to be made available would be allotted on force accounts.

ARKANSAS

Gov. Harvey Parnell, of Arkansas, wrote Governor Pollard that he was in hearty accord with his ideas. He suggests one additional provision, namely, that any extra Federal aid allowed a State could be matched against regular Federal aid the same as was done in 1931, and under H. R. 14804, Public, No. 550, Seventy-first Congress. He states that unless the Federal Government can allow the extra Federal aid to be matched against regular Federal aid it would be of little use to Arkansas. He states that all Members of the Arkansas delegation in Congress are willing to make strenuous effort for the measure.

FLORIDA

Gov. Doyle E. Carlton describes the plan as a very practical suggestion and pledges his cooperation.

IDAHO

Gov. C. Ben Ross is in favor of a program of direct appropriation from the Federal Government to carry on the road work to alleviate unemployment during next 12 months. He believes that the time of repayment should spread over a period of more than 10 years, and states that in his territory road funds can be expended as economically in the winter months as in the summer months.

ILLINOIS

Chief Highway Engineer Frank T. Sheets states that if increased Federal funds become available their construction budget could be increased proportionately. Such a course would be helpful and his State would favor it. According to Mr. Sheets, Illinois is heartily in favor of increased appropriation for road purposes.

KANSAS

Gov. Harry H. Woodring states that the plan would be most helpful to Kansas and pledges his cooperation for its consideration. He states that in his section funds could be used in the winter as well as summer.

KENTUCKY

Gov. Flem D. Sampson writes that the plan seems to him to be in every way sound and desirable, and it is his belief that if adopted it would serve the interests of the people in Kentucky.

MICHIGAN

Gov. Wilber M. Brucker writes that he is in hearty agreement with the proposal and is of the opinion that it will be of distinct value in promoting unemployment relief. The assurance of additional Federal funds would make it possible to complete certain road projects at an earlier date than otherwise could be expected.

MISSISSIPPI

Gov. Theodore G. Bilbo thinks the idea is a splendid one and that it would help conditions in his State materially. His cooperation is pledged.

MONTANA

Gov. J. E. Erickson has discussed the matter with Montana's Representatives in Congress, and he is of the opinion that the Montana delegation will be in accord with some such policy. He states that the unemployment situation in his section is not as acute as in some others but that there is a great deal of suffering from last summer's drought. He is in favor of putting idle men to work on the highways and other public improvements.

NEVADA

Gov. F. B. Balzar is in hearty sympathy with the suggestion and hopes that such legislation will be enacted.

NORTH CAROLINA

Hon. E. B. Jeffress, chairman of the State Highway Commission, states that the Highway Commission of North Carolina is in agreement generally with the proposition and that his State could use additional Federal aid to a great advantage, especially if it did not have to be matched with State funds.

NORTH DAKOTA

Gov. George F. Schafer will be glad to join in a request that this legislation be enacted, as it is his opinion that this method of providing unemployment relief is less burdensome than other methods. He states that highway construction is the most practical way of meeting the unemployment situation.

OREGON

Gov. Julius L. Meyer states that the plan as suggested by Governor Pollard is worthy of consideration, and in his judgment possesses considerable merit. He states that it is from the employment of hand labor that Oregon gets the greatest amount of relief and the largest and most general distribution of funds. He suggests that as far as Oregon is concerned, the funds available should not be conditioned on their being matched by State funds.

PENNSYLVANIA

Gov. Gifford Pinchot writes that at first blush his impression is very strongly in favor of the plan, but he asks further time to consider.

TENNESSEE

Gov. Henry H. Horton writes that the plan seems to him altogether commendable and that it would do much to relieve unemployment in his State. He pledges his cooperation.

TEXAS

Gov. R. S. Sterling writes that this is one way of providing employment, and that he is for most anything that will aid in this crisis.

WEST VIRGINIA

Gov. William D. Connely states that in his belief such an arrangement would be beneficial and materially aid the unemployment situation.

WISCONSIN

Gov. Philip F. La Follette advances the opinion that it is unnecessary to provide that deductions be made from future Federal aid to pay back the money. He states that if the entire sum is advanced now the Federal Government can reduce its Federal aid to roads during prosperous times.

WYOMING

Hon. Z. E. Sevison, superintendent of the State highway department, writes Gov. A. M. Clark suggesting a resolution by Congress deferring for two years the repayment of the $80,000,000 advance funds of December, 1930. He suggests a direct appropriation of probably $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 for emergency road improvement work, to be expended entirely on the Federal-aid highway system. He recognizes the advantage of having additional road funds made available.

So much, Mr. President, for that part of the substitute which provides an appropriation for road-construction work.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. In line with the statements made by the various governors, it might be a good idea to put in the RECORD two short paragraphs from the testimony of Governor Pinchot before the Manufactures Committee on this subject. If the Senator would like to have me do so, I can read it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. BLACK. I read from Governor Pinchot's statement before the Committee on Manufactures as follows:

We have established six road-work camps, to which the men come and live in the camps. We have had from eight to ten times the applications for work in the camps than we could take care of.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those camps maintained by the State?

Governor PINCHOT. They are maintained entirely by the State. They are road-work camps. We shall establish other camps if we can, but the failure of the legislature to give us any more money for road building is going to interfere very seriously with that program.

I have taken the position that we ought to do whatever we can this winter to relieve distress, even if our road program next summer is destroyed. We had on December 26, 1931, 28,283 men at work on the roads. We saved the situation last summer in a great many of the counties by work on the roads, and we are doing the same in many counties now.

I may state to the Senator from Montana that at a later time, after he shall have finished, I expect to have inserted in the RECORD an article with reference to road work in Pennsylvania, which shows that they have been doing the work with a maximum amount of human labor and have secured the construction of highways at $5,000 per mile.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Before the Senator leaves this subject I think it ought to be emphasized that the Congress in an act which became a law in February of last year declared as the policy of Congress that during times of economic depression a public-works program ought to be enlarged and accelerated so as to absorb the unemployment caused by industrial slackness. If the administration, it seems to me, had followed that mandate of Congress which was enacted into law, we should not have to be pleading for an enlarged public-works program to-day in order to absorb unemployment. I think that is a fair statement of the situation, is it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; and again referring to the preparation of the Budget for this year, it occurs to me that in the preparation of the Budget the policy thus declared to be the policy of Congress was entirely ignored.

Now, Mr. President, I merely add, with respect to this feature of the proposed amendment, that it provides for an appropriation for road construction exactly the same as that in the bill for which it is offered as a substitute, the road appropriation to be handled under the provisions of the general Federal highways act, except that it is provided that any portion of the funds may be utilized for the improvement of roads and streets within municipalities, which is forbidden by the general act, and likewise that the funds need not be matched by the States.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. That exception does not include a township. It includes, I assume, villages and cities having streets and roads, but does not include a township as a municipality?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The amendment is framed with reference to the language of the general act, and that provision of the general act, whatever it is, is declared to be nugatory, so far as this appropriation is concerned.

Mr. BLAINE. I assume that has special reference to incorporated cities and villages and not to townships? It clearly must be so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not sure how it has been interpreted, but I should think the Senator is correct about it.

Mr. BLAINE. It surely must be so, because the greater part of the mileage of Federal highways, of course, is in the country, and that means in the townships.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should think, accordingly, that the language would not be construed to forbid construction within a township.

Mr. BLAINE. Then let me make a further inquiry in connection with this subject. One-third, as I understand, of the $375,000,000 is to be expended in the fiscal year 1932. Is that amount to be expended upon that portion of the highways which are designated as Federal-aid highways?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should think it would be, because it is provided that it is to be expended in accordance with the provisions of the Federal highways act.

Mr. BLAINE. I merely wanted to be certain that that was the Senator's interpretation of the language of the act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that is correct.

Mr. BLAINE. That is my interpretation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, as I have said, it was my view that the situation was to be taken care of by an expanded program of public works, but, in deference to the views of quite a number of Senators, a further provision has been included in the amendment, which, perhaps, is more directly intended as a substitute for the bill as it was reported by the committee. It was contended that while road work was desirable and helpful in a large way, it did not actually meet the situation in many of the States and in particular communities within the States. So the substitute contains a further provision for the appropriation of a like amount to be apportioned among the several States. Any State may avail itself of it by making an application for its allotment or any portion of its allotment, and it is now provided that the amount thus advanced to the State is to be repaid to the Government, the advance constituting, in effect, a loan; that is to say, the governor of the State is to certify that the amount is needed, and that it can not be supplied by the resources of the State or by private organization operating for the relief of the needy within the State.

Then the governor also makes a statement that he will use his best endeavors to secure the repayment by the State of the advances made to it; that is to say, that he will recommend repayment to the legislature, if the legislature is authorized to provide for repayment, or, if it becomes necessary to have an amendment to the constitution, that he will recommend an amendment to the constitution; but, in any case, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], if provision should not be made by the State within three years for repayment, then for each of the succeeding five years one-fifth of the amount thus advanced to the State shall be deducted from any allotment of funds to the State under the general highways act. So repayment to the Federal Government is assured by the provisions of the substitute bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. In that connection, may I suggest that the $80,000,000 emergency appropriation is to be deducted from the State's share within a 5-year period? So the result would be under this provision that there would be at least two years, if not three, during which there would be a double deduction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a deduction on account of the State's share of the $80,000,000 and a deduction on account of the State's share of the $125,000,000 provided in this proposed amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Provided the State called for the money; provided the State, in effect, borrowed it from the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. Provided the State called for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And for so much as it called for.

Mr. BLAINE. So that, as a result, after five years, there would be a diminishing amount of Federal aid to the several States, which would contract the availability of funds for the absorption of labor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; to such extent as the States borrowed. Of course, however, we are hoping that after the lapse of at least three years the situation will be somewhat improved, even though prosperity is not "just around the corner" at the present time.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will pardon the suggestion, he is very optimistic, and I was wondering if he were basing his optimism on the prospects in the next presidential campaign.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That will contribute, I am sure.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will state that, under the amendment which has been accepted and is now a part of the proposed substitute, no deduction by the Government from the Federal appropriations for aid of the States in highway construction will commence to apply until after three years, and then only at the rate of one-fifth of the sum advanced to the States—one-fifth each year until paid. Consequently it would be from eight to nine years before the deductions would be completed, and they would never exceed one-fifth. Even if the $80,000,000 referred to were paid back in the same way as the other advance is to be paid back, it would still leave very close to four-fifths of the entire State aid from the Federal Government.

I will state further that the Governor of Wisconsin, as I read his statement, proposed that the money to be advanced by the Federal Government in addition to other appropriations for road work should be deducted from future advances by the Government, but the deductions should not be provided for at this time, because that could be done later. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana and others does not require any matching of the $375,000,000 at all or any repayment at any time. Therefore it was conceived that the repayment of the loans to the States for charity work as they would be paid back only one-fifth each year after three years would not be burdensome.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Summarizing the essential differences between the pending bill and the direct-relief feature of the substitute it might be said that the bill makes a gift to the States of whatever is allotted or apportioned to them under it. The substitute makes these advances a loan to be repaid to the Federal Government.

The bill itself, as reported by the committee, puts the administration of the fund practically in the hands of a bureau in the city of Washington. The substitute puts the administration of the fund entirely in the hands of the State authorities. I spend no time in discussing the comparative merits of these two plans. I merely endeavor to point out what the difference is.

The system of administration provided by the bill reported by the committee is, however, in my judgment, open to the most serious objections. The fundamental objections to the bill were so elaborately pointed out by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] that I pass that feature of it simply to call attention to some of the provisions which, it seems to me, make the system entirely unworkable.

I shall be very glad to have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the latter apparently not being in the Chamber at this time. I desire, however, to call attention to some features of this measure which I think indicate that this bill could not possibly have been prepared by the two gentlemen named, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] being a very able lawyer and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] being an experienced legislator.

At page 7 of the bill will be found section 6, which in part reads as follows:

> Any State making application for funds under this act shall, by the agency designated or created to cooperate with the board, submit at such times as may be prescribed by the board plans for carrying out the provisions of this act within such State.

I beg to say in this matter and to give my assurance to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have no disposition to be carping in my criticism of this measure; but I am sure he will give me credit for finding substantial objection to the plan as it is recited in the bill.

Section 6 continues:

> The plans shall be subject to the approval of the board—

That board, as has been indicated, consists of the Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor, the Director of Extension Work in the Department of Agriculture, the chief of the vocational rehabilitation service of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and two members to be appointed by the President; but later on it is provided that the Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor shall be charged with the administration of this act, subject to the supervision of the board, so that the Chief of the Children's Bureau is really the active agent in the administration of the fund that is created by the act.

> The plans shall be subject to the approval of the board and shall, within the discretion of the board, include the following:

Now, these are the plans:

> (1) An estimate of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available, and of the amounts actually expended, for emergency relief by public and private agencies in the State for the calendar years 1929, 1930, and 1931.

Subdivision (2) is as follows. Now, this is the plan:

> (2) An estimate of the amounts necessary to meet the needs of emergency relief in the State in the calendar year 1932 and, upon call of the board, in the calendar year 1933; (3) provision for adequate State administrative personnel, whose qualifications to administer relief activities shall meet with the approval of the board.

Subdivision (b) of this section provides that—

> The Children's Bureau may, and at the request of the board shall, make such investigations as may be necessary to verify the statements and confirm the plans submitted by the State agency.

Then section 7, immediately following, provides:

> Within the limits of the apportionment made to any State on the basis of population the board may certify the payment to the State of not more than 40 per cent of the difference between estimated emergency relief expenditures in the State for the calendar year 1929 and the estimated needs of the State for the calendar year 1932 or 1933, as the case may be.

So, Mr. President, the governor of the State, in order to get the relief provided for by the bill, must certify the amount which was expended by the State for the calendar year 1929 for relief work; and that, I take it, is assumed to be a normal year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say that at the time both of the original bills were introduced they provided for taking the calendar year 1928 as the normal year against which to make comparisons in order to endeavor to arrive at an estimate of the emergency relief load due to unemployment. However, the testimony developed that the figures for relief in 1928 were not readily available, either in the localities or in the States, inasmuch as there had never been any particular attention paid to the amount of moneys provided for private and public charities and relief work in 1928 and years prior to that time. Therefore, the substitute bill—that is, the new bill, the joint bill—took the year 1929 as being the one year for which figures were available, and which, according to the testimony, could be considered to be almost as good a base year for normal expenditures as 1928.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then the governor of the State, as I take it, is required in the first place to submit a statement concerning the amount that was expended in his State during the year 1929 for emergency relief work, and then he is to submit an estimate of the amount which it is expected will be needed for similar work in 1932 or 1933, as the case may be; and 40 per cent of that difference is allotted to the State.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to add to what was said by the Senator from Wisconsin that Mr. Hurlin, an expert statistician associated with the Russell Sage Foundation, particularly recommended for statistical reasons that 1929 be taken as the proper year for comparison?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is quite aside from what I have to say whether 1928 is taken or whether 1929 is taken. The point is that the governor is required to make a statement concerning the amount that was expended in his State for relief work during 1929, as the bill now reads, and then he is to make an estimate of the amount that is necessary for 1932 or 1933, as the case may be; and the difference between those two amounts represents the increased demand that is to be made upon the State. When he does that the Children's Bureau may, and at the request of the board shall, make such investigations as may be necessary to verify the statements and confirm the plans that have been made. In other words, the Children's Bureau will have to send to the State of Montana or to the State of Wyoming or to the State of New York and check up every city and community in the State in order to ascertain whether or not the governor has given the correct figures; and some little girl who has just taken a course in some social-service school will go out to the State of New York, and, after an exhaustive survey all over the State of New York to ascertain how much money was spent for emergency work in that State in the year 1929, will come back and report that the governor of the State is all wrong; that he has his figures altogether too high or too low, as the case may be.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield. I desire to inquire, however, in the first place, how many inspectors will be necessary, what kind of an army we would have to have here to gather up these facts or to verify any statements of that character made by the governors of the States?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana whether, in his judgment, the provisions which he has read are more stringent than those in the laws, frequently passed by the Congress, relating to Federal aid in the construction of public roads?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the legislation regarding public roads is rather an old story. It has been in operation now for 16 years. However, I call attention to the fact that this, as I view it, contemplates the organization here in the city of Washington of an enormous force of inspectors who are to go about the various States to ascertain the situation.

So, you will observe, subdivision (2) provides for—

An estimate of the amounts necessary to meet the needs of emergency relief in the State in the calendar year 1932 and, upon call of the board, in the calendar year 1933.

The governor estimates that so much is necessary. An inspector will be sent out to the State to check up on whether or not that amount is actually necessary; and a controversy will thus be precipitated between an inspector sent out and the authorities of the State who certify with respect to this matter.

There is another provision of that part of the bill to which I desire to call attention.

Another condition in section 6 is that the plans shall make—

(5) Provision satisfactory to the board for securing the benefits contemplated by this act to persons within the State, irrespective of the period of residence within the State.

That is to say, the State can not get a dollar unless it submits plans by which it is going to take care of people who are within the State who are not residents of that State.

That may be a very wise thing to do, Mr. President; but we all realize that for centuries the contrary doctrine has been upheld by all the States, dating back from the old New England laws. Each town took care of the residents of that town who were poor and needy, and no nonresident of the town could claim a dollar of it; and that is the law now in most of our States. The counties are called upon to take care of the needy in my State, and they make appropriation accordingly; but they refuse to give any relief or aid to people who are not residents of the county, and they are enjoined to do so under the law. So that no State can get any benefit from this law that will not agree to take care of people who are nonresidents of the State, contrary to the policy of the State.

Having made that provision, however, the bill then, at pages 10 and 11, takes further care of these people who are nonresidents of the State, for subdivision (b) of section 10 provides:

The board is authorized, either in cooperation with the several States, through special grants or otherwise, or by such other means and agencies as it may determine, to make payments out of the reserve fund for the purpose of extending relief to migratory workers and their families, who, by reason of inability to establish legal residence within any State, are unable to qualify for benefits under any State-relief plan.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not desire to interrupt the informative discussion of the Senator from Montana, but at this point I venture to ask whether he has given consideration to the testimony taken by the Committee on Manufactures with respect to what is known as the migratory or transitory problem, which was discussed by me last week?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I remember reading the testimony of the gentlemen who spoke in regard to it.

However that may be, in the first place, under the bill a State could not get any portion of this fund unless the plans which it submitted provided for taking care of the nonresidents as well as the residents of the State. But the bill provides, in addition to that, that the board itself may make just such provision as it sees fit to take care of the unemployed of the State. In other words, there will be the distribution of money directly by the Federal authority here in the city of Washington to those who happen to be in the State of Montana, who are not residents there, or who happen to be in the city of New York, who are not residents there. We all realize that there are probably thousands of people in the city of New York who are not residents of the city of New York, and many of them may be in need of aid. That aid will be given to them directly from the bureau here in Washington, if the board sees fit to so direct.

What I have said does not cover by any means, in my judgment, the only objections to the system of distribution proposed by the pending bill. I refer to these objections as indicating what I think was only hasty consideration of the frame-up of the measure.

Mr. President, I now venture to appeal to the authors of the bill to give their support, and the support of their friends whom they can influence, to the substitute which has been offered. There is a very decided majority of this body, I am sure, in favor of a plan of Federal relief in the present situation. I believe there is an overwhelming majority of the Senate that is in favor of an expanded road-construction program, to all of whom the substitute ought to make a strong appeal.

The authors of the bill undoubtedly realize that there is on this side of the Chamber a deep-seated hostility, its roots extending away back into the historic past, against enlarging the field of Federal operation or intrusting a Federal authority with functions which belong in a realm which the States have always heretofore almost exclusively considered as their own. A very wholesome dread pervades the entire country against the multiplication of bureaus and other agencies of government here in Washington.

Why should we divide our forces at this particular time? I make bold to say that I feel confident that the authors of the bill are entirely with us upon that feature of it. They have done a grand piece of work in forcing public attention to this all-important problem, and they would add to the credit that is due to them by now giving their support to a measure which stands some chance of having the approval of this body and of passing an Executive veto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] in the nature of a substitute, as modified.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Sheppard
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bailey	Dale	Keyes	Smith
Bankhead	Dickinson	King	Smoot
Barbour	Dill	La Follette	Steiwer

Caraway	Hayden	Patterson	Watson
Carey	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Howell	Reed	White
Coolidge	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Costigan	Jones	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BULKLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, at this point, following the very informative discussion by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on the question of unemployment, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the testimony of Mr. George W. Welsh, city manager of Grand Rapids, Mich., before the Committee on Manufactures, as it appears on pages 270 to 275 of the hearings. I do this because Mr. Welsh states that in his city the authorities have utilized the employment of men with wheelbarrows, picks, and shovels; that all who are able to work have been taken care of; and his testimony is a very excellent discussion of the problem.

I desire also to have printed in the RECORD immediately following that testimony an article appearing in the October issue of the Highway Engineer and Contractor on the subject "Pennsylvania's $100,000,000 Road Program," by Rollin Stone. This article shows that roads are being built in Pennsylvania, with a maximum of human labor, at $5,000 per mile.

Both of these matters I ask to have inserted are very interesting, and it is for that reason that I want them to appear in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF GEORGE W. WELSH, CITY MANAGER OF GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please give your full name to the stenographer?

Mr. WELSH. George W. Welsh, Grand Rapids, Mich.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you city manager of Grand Rapids?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir; for three years.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been giving consideration to the problems of unemployment and its relief in Grand Rapids?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give the committee the benefit of such information as you have concerning the amount of unemployment in Grand Rapids at present as compared with 1928 or 1929 and the manner in which unemployment relief has been provided in your city?

Mr. WELSH. In Grand Rapids the problem of unemployment relief is a problem of the municipality.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no private charitable organizations?

Mr. WELSH. We have several organizations, such as a community chest, which raises money, as in former years, for character-building agencies. The problem of direct relief due to unemployment has been assumed entirely by the municipality. That differs, of course, with the testimony of Mr. Dykstra that his city is taking part of the load, and of Mr. Ryerson that private enterprise is taking part of the load. In our case the city does it all.

In regard to the increase, the figures that I have bear no relation to the unemployment problem. We deal only with those who are in immediate need and only after a thorough investigation as to whether they have any other resources, so that the number of people to whom we are giving relief would not be an accurate estimate as to those who are out of employment.

In 1928 and 1929, which were normal years, the welfare department of the city spent for administration and material relief $51,000.

In 1930 we spent $297,665.10, and from April 1 to December 31 of this year $631,948.49. That is money spent directly for relief and does not represent money which has been spent for public projects or made work, on which part of our relief load has been placed.

The CHAIRMAN. How much have those expenditures been?

Mr. WELSH. I have not a list of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you approximate them?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; we are spending this year on one project $435,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a project which you would ordinarily have undertaken, or was it undertaken in part for the purpose of providing employment?

Mr. WELSH. For the purpose of providing employment and to relieve us of the financial burden. For instance, during the winter of 1930, we spent $130,000 for snow removal, using that to relieve the welfare department, which at that time was short of funds. This represents perhaps 50 per cent more than would normally have been done. In other words, we did the job better and more of it because we had the money in our street-service department, and in various departments of the city we did likewise during the early part of the depression.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell the committee what standard of work relief is given to those who are receiving this direct aid?

Mr. WELSH. In Grand Rapids we insist that every able-bodied citizen asking for relief—after having a physical examination by our own physicians as to whether he is capable of doing heavy work or light work or no work at all—be required to perform some public work and give the relief that is necessary for his family.

The average cost at the present time for material relief per family is something over $6.25 per week.

The CHAIRMAN. Per family?

Mr. WELSH. Per family; yes. In addition to that, we count medical relief and hospitalization at the present time as part of our relief program.

For instance, since April 1 up to December 31, in addition to $631,000, we have spent $116,000 on medical relief, hospitalization, maternity cases, and various other cases.

Senator HATFIELD. Over what period of time?

Mr. WELSH. April 1 to December 31.

The CHAIRMAN. How many families or heads of families are receiving aid?

Mr. WELSH. At the present time heads of 3,600 families are working for their direct relief.

The CHAIRMAN. How does that compare with a year ago?

Mr. WELSH. It is greater.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. WELSH. I should think close to one-third. We supplement what we are doing by seeing that those in need of relief are placed on public projects where we have money available for the projects. We do not encourage projects that do not give the maximum amount of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. What type of projects have you been undertaking?

Mr. WELSH. We have used many types of projects—improvement of parks, opening of dead-end streets, grading of unimproved streets, and so forth—where the work can be done without the expenditure of moneys for materials. We have laid over 10 miles of water mains, our water department paying for the mains out of their funds and we supplying the labor.

The $435,000 item mentioned previously was for the completion of trunk sewers.

We do no projects that can not be done with the maximum of labor and the minimum of material and equipment. In other words, our equipment consists almost entirely of wheelbarrows, shovels and picks, and planks to roll the wheelbarrows on, and in doing our park work using only such equipment as the city already possesses.

We had a very interesting experiment in the past month, competing with the contractors on sewer projects, competing with the engineer's estimate of the cost of the job—something over $7,000. By using no machinery we have completed the job under the estimate of the engineers and have taken care of 40 families on that job.

Senator COSTIGAN. Do you pay a minimum city wage in such cases?

Mr. WELSH. We pay 40 cents an hour.

Senator HATFIELD. That is for common labor?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; all labor that is welfare labor.

Senator HATFIELD. Most of it is common labor?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator COSTIGAN. Is that under a charter provision or a rule you have established?

Mr. WELSH. No; the city has always let public works out on contract. What we are trying to do now is have the city do the work using welfare labor and using the maximum amount of man power as against machinery.

Senator COSTIGAN. Who determines the hourly wage?

Mr. WELSH. The city commission.

Senator HATFIELD. How do you raise this money—by taxation or bond issue?

Mr. WELSH. Bond issue.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any debt limit for cities in the State of Michigan?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the limit?

Mr. WELSH. We are well within our limit. The Michigan statute allows 10 per cent of the assessed valuation. That would allow us, in Grand Rapids, something over $26,000,000, against which we have at the present time outstanding bonds, minus our sinking fund, a little over $9,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of those issues is due to the employment-relief program?

Mr. WELSH. Well, we are allowed to issue, under special State provision, one-fourth of 1 per cent for emergency relief—one-fourth of 1 per cent of our assessed valuation. On that basis we have issued something over $700,000 worth of bonds. We have issued $435,000 for sewer construction, and have just recently passed and will be asking for $1,750,000 to continue that program.

The CHAIRMAN. Are these new sewer projects, or are you relaying some of the old sewers?

Mr. WELSH. It is largely new. It is the completion of a sanitary system started some time ago.

Senator HATFIELD. When will that be completed?

Mr. WELSH. We figure that it will take the better part of a year or more, if we get the money. We have to sell the bonds.

Senator HATFIELD. It is pretty hard to sell bonds at the present time?

Mr. WELSH. We will know within a week or two.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all. Thank you very much, Mr. Welsh.

Mr. DYKSTRA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have my testimony understood as discussing purely and solely the question of emergency unemployment relief. I took into consideration no such projects as Mr. Welsh has—either water, sewer, or bond projects of any sort—in which we have, of course, absorbed a tremendous amount of labor. But I threw that all out and confined myself to immediate emergency relief which could not be considered under any other head.

The CHAIRMAN. I so understood your testimony.

Mr. WELSH. We have tried to keep the cost of emergency relief outside of our usual expenditures; and, as Mr. Dykstra has said, we have supplemented it to such an extent that the exact amount does not represent the actual needs, because we have used these other projects, as in Cincinnati.

I would like to say, however, that I have read over the bills, and while I am glad to see the Government is taking an interest, I am opposed to the handing out of money; we do not have that in Grand Rapids, and it would change our entire system. I believe that the only remedy for unemployment is work. I believe it would be possible for the Government to provide that work just as we have been doing in Grand Rapids.

The CHAIRMAN. By the public-works program?

Mr. WELSH. No; I believe——

The CHAIRMAN. Or do you mean by making available to the city money for made-work programs?

Mr. WELSH. I would not advocate the usual type of made-work programs where a small amount of that appropriated goes for labor and a large amount goes for material. I believe that the plan we have tried out for two years in Grand Rapids could be extended to the States and to the National Government. I would make this army of unemployed a work army. I believe that the Government could find projects enough throughout the country to take these men out of the city—Mr. Ryerson's 10,000 single men—and put them on projects using labor only. The work that every one of our men does is on work that requires no outlay for material or machinery—just work they can do with shovels, wheelbarrows, picks, and planks to run wheelbarrows on. We have kept over 3,000 men employed every day.

We have been running over two years, and I believe it would be possible for the Government to do the same thing at the minimum of cost.

We have the single man's problem as they have in the larger cities, where it costs less than $2 a week to maintain these men. If they were given useful and helpful labor in return for that, I think it would be a wise thing to do.

I think if married men were taken and put to work and the proceeds of their labors sent back to the cities to maintain their families, so they would feel they were really earning what they were getting, that would be the wise thing to do. I think it should be done. I believe that a program could be worked out through the Army organization, the Army engineers, and other resources that the Government has, so that instead of supporting these people, having them idle in the cities, they would be out doing some useful work in return for the relief they are getting.

We have many miles of major water mains; we have improved streets and parks and have had no difficulty in finding enough legitimate projects.

I believe the Government could do the same thing, and perhaps encourage the States to carry some of the load. I would like to emphasize, as Mr. Dykstra has, that it is not so much a question of what have we done, but what are we going to do. Are we going to be able to sell bonds? If the balance of the President's program has the effect of solving that problem, our city is in a position to carry on. We are not over our bonded limit. It has not been a tremendous tax burden because the bonds have been issued over a period of three years. It will be a burden three years from now. If we could be assured of sufficient money to amortize them over a period of 15 years, we would be prepared to go through this for the next 3 or 4 years.

But if the purpose of your bills is to hand us money, and we have to hand it out, it would disrupt the system we have at the present time, and perhaps the advertisement of the fact the Federal Government will spend this money will increase our load.

Senator COSTIGAN. You do not find anything in the bills calling on localities to do more with Federal funds than they are now doing?

Mr. WELSH. No.

Senator COSTIGAN. Do you see any inconsistency between an emergency program for immediate need and a public-works program?

Mr. WELSH. I doubt if you were to appropriate money to build buildings and that sort of stuff—well, the cost would be so great, and the need at the present time is to see that these people do not suffer. If the maximum amount you appropriated was to be spent in labor and not in materials, that would be the desirable thing. I do not know what the size of the problem is in the country, but it must be a big one.

Senator COSTIGAN. You do recognize an immediate emergency in the Nation as a whole?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator COSTIGAN. Which calls for some form of national action?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; the responsibility can not be the municipality's alone.

Senator COSTIGAN. What the committee is now considering is an emergency program for the prevention of suffering and starvation. The long-time program to which you refer, of keeping the idle employed, is not necessarily inconsistent with the first suggestion, is it?

Mr. WELSH. Except that I think it would be better to employ them and let them earn the relief for their families than to give the relief and leave them idle; in other words, every dollar that we have raised by bond issue, outside of those families where there is no able-bodied breadwinner, has gone into groceries and fuel which have been converted through labor into relief. They have been earning what they have received. I think that some such plan as that is feasible, and your money would go farther.

Senator COSTIGAN. If Federal funds were made available to you for relief purposes, you would desire to expend them in that fashion?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. I presume under the bill we would get something like $300,000 in a year, but I would like to know where we will get the balance.

PENNSYLVANIA'S $100,000,000 ROAD PROGRAM

By Rollin Stone

Road programs of 20,000 miles and budgets of $100,000,000 and maintenance schedules of more than 33,000 miles sound like drunken engineers in Utopia. But that is what they're saying in Pennsylvania—and meaning it, too.

Pennsylvania recently took over 20,000 miles of roads from the townships, adding them to her thirteen thousand-odd miles of State highways. Of the sum total, about 12,000 miles were improved and about 3,000 miles are on the 1931 working schedule. Of the 1931 program, some 800 miles were given a "light-type" treatment which must be followed up immediately to obtain a permanent improvement, and avoid loss of work done to date.

So Pennsylvania is working out plans to improve the greatest mileage of roadways in the history of any Commonwealth and sets new marks for many a country to shoot at. Gov. Gifford Pinchot has ordered it, and Secretary of Highways Sam Lewis and Chief Engineer Sam Eckels have promised to do it. Neither will leave anything undone to make good.

In the matter of finances, the department was looking forward to about $130,000,000 for a fiscal biennium at the outset of the administration, which took office in January, 1931. Federal aid made a contribution and counties added funds. The new administration was badly cramped for cash at the outset as the old one had obligated every penny in hand and no new funds were in sight until the new year—June 1—had turned. In the face of such difficulties and largely on the strength of Federal aid, the department wrangled through a program of 3,000 miles. Many an experienced contractor stood by with bulging eyes.

So the new season is faced with the confidence inspired by ready cash—an unobligated pocketbook. Relief of slack labor is a serious factor in the program and Governor Pinchot is taking a personal interest in the machinery of the program.

One of the revolutionary phases of Pennsylvania's new road program is the type or types of roads that are planned. It must be puzzling to even the neophyte in construction that 20,000 miles and $100,000,000 be mentioned in the same breath. Speeches and published announcements and bits of conference echo all confirm it. The actual tabulated program is still on the conference board, but public promises by high officials have virtually told it. It remains only for the routine announcement and the detailed workings to be brought forth.

Between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000 has been spent, obligated, or budgeted for equipment and maintenance materials within a few months. The following description of types and methods will confirm the obvious need of more.

When the 20,000 miles of township roads were transferred by legislation to the department of highways, the department, in anticipation, had already made a state-wide survey of native materials—stone, sand, gravel, red dogs, slag. All sources were classified and spotted by the laboratory.

Without a real program at this stage, the department hastily began what amounted to a makeshift program in order that the season be not lost. This resulted in the construction of—unreal though it may sound—$5,000 per mile road. Virtually all the work was done by the department with greatly expanded forces.

Not that contractors were pushed aside. The department went into conference with them, told them the whole story, showed them the program and the bank balance. "We would be very happy to place large mileages with contractors," officials said. "It would remove some of our anxiety that snow will fly before we get these 1,700 miles completed. We are not worried about the work now under contract—the so-called Federal-aid program. We kept schedule on that and got our money."

Then came the question: "Will you contractors undertake some of this work on the condition that our estimates, which are very, very close, be the final word? Will you promise, if we show you these estimates, to bid on sample jobs and keep your bids under the estimates? Will you also promise to keep our time schedule?"

A few were willing and a few jobs were advertised for bids. As this is written, the bids have been opened a few hours, three of the low bidders were too high and bidders were scarce on the others. The high bids have been rejected. The department will do the work.

In the past several years concrete has been undisputed king in Pennsylvania highway circles. Macadam types have been unpopular. In many localities the people have protested loudly when the State advertised for macadam bids. They even offered to put up the necessary funds to pay the difference. Contractors responded right nobly to the urge and became very expert in the art of pouring concrete roads. In Pennsylvania the trend this season is distinctly macadam, and of a type that even the memory of old contractors does not recall.

Just how this huge program for 1932 will be carried out not even the Pennsylvania Department of Highways is willing to say right now. Whether or not contractors take a large hand in the construction is believed largely a problem for the contractors, who will have to learn in a great hurry the art and science of good roads at low prices with operations and costs on a par with radio time—"20 seconds past noon, exactly."

Some have been gleaned by observers, who watched the department with its own forces build roads at $5,000 and less per mile. Sometimes it was much less, too.

One of the factors decidedly not a problem was the great number of men. These were to be had, of course, with ease. Labor rates were 30 cents to 40 cents. The department had, in a typical week, 17,000 men on its maintenance pay roll. Maintenance, here, was a misnomer, of course.

The next factor was not so easy at first—equipment. With the bulk of the work being done by hand labor and with local materials, plus speed, speed, speed, to beat the season, equipment in huge quantities was called for. The Pennsylvania department has for many years been among the best-equipped organizations in the country. But it had a heavy maintenance schedule and could not release all its equipment for construction.

New equipment was bought and much was rented. Rental was a needed boost to idle owners, incidentally. Hand tools were in demand as never since the war.

With a program of 1,700 miles to study, it seems safe to forecast a better understanding of "low-cost-type" macadam with native materials. In a program of 20,000 miles the field seems wide open to all comers willing to qualify.

The magic formula of the new type is: Minimum grading, reasonable brushing out, base course of stone to depth required by subsoil, surface course, and surface treatment. Widths variable, 14 feet upward, as traffic requires. Plans: None (economy).

Mention was made that the need for more equipment would be obvious as the magnitude of this program became apparent. Let it be said that a look just ahead reveals another program for another season. Furthermore, programs may come and go, but maintenance is with us always.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment in the nature of a substitute which is now pending, in the preparation of which I collaborated with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH.] These distinguished Senators have so fully and so capably discussed the substitute that I find but little remains to be said, and I shall detain the Senate only a few moments.

I understand that the question underlying all the discussion is the question of whether we have arrived at the point where Federal aid for unemployment relief is really necessary. It would seem that no one contends that relief to the hungry and destitute is primarily a Federal obligation. As I read the hearings before the Committee on Manufactures, practically every witness declared that the obligation to take care of those in need is primarily a local obligation, and even those who under the existing circumstances stated that it is necessary for the Federal Government to lend assistance at this time also testified that that action ought to be taken only as a last resort. The very form of the pending bill shows the encouragement that its authors desire to give to local efforts to obtain contributions from local sources and State aid. So I take it that it is not necessary to argue that the Federal Government should be involved in the situation only as a final and a last resort.

Has the time come when Federal aid is necessary? Have local and State agencies so broken down as to convince us that we, representing the Federal Government, must take action? Or is such breakdown in immediate prospect?

Mr. President, I believe that it is in immediate prospect. I believe that the evidence taken before the Committee on Manufactures demonstrates beyond a doubt that such a breakdown is near; that if the Federal Government does not stand ready to give some aid in this situation, there will be actual starvation in many communities in the near future.

Speaking particularly concerning the witnesses representing the State of Ohio, who appeared before that committee, I can vouch for them as excellent, responsible men. Their words are to be relied upon. They would not exaggerate a situation, and they did not. Their statements are conservative and are well supported by the evidence which they produced. The conditions in the metropolitan communities of Ohio are even worse to-day than at the time the evidence was taken. There is but little acute distress in the rural communities in Ohio, but in the great cities conditions are getting worse, the number dependent upon charity is increasing and the funds available for taking care of them are being very rapidly diminished.

The crisis is not far off. From a very well-informed source in my State I have the estimate that for the year 1932, matching the needs of the State of Ohio for relief to the hungry and distressed against all of the funds from every source which are now in sight, there will be a shortage for the calendar year of some $21,000,000 for the State.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I inquire of the Senator whether or not the welfare work is performed by municipalities or by the State government in his State?

Mr. BULKLEY. It is performed by different agencies, the most important part being by local charitable organizations which have functioned for a long time. In Cleveland, for example, there has been cooperation between the welfare federation, the Jewish charities, and the municipality. The county has contributed to poor relief also.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do the county treasury and the cities and towns appropriate funds for the use of official boards or public agencies which distribute those funds?

Mr. BULKLEY. They have paid money in many cases. The practice is not uniform throughout the State, but in many cases the distribution is made through established charitable organizations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do not all the cities and towns maintain welfare boards or boards that are known in some localities as overseers of the poor, to take care of the destitute?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; but there is an emergency now that has required more than such boards have been able to handle.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Have not such municipalities and communities increased those appropriations because of the increased demand for food and clothing from those in want?

Mr. BULKLEY. In some cases, yes; and in others additional appropriations have been voted down. Tax levies have been approved in some counties and voted down in others.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Legislature of the State of Ohio appropriated any money to be distributed among the municipalities of Ohio for relief work in conjunction with appropriations made by the local communities?

Mr. BULKLEY. I take it the Senator is referring to State funds?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. No; that is not the case. The State legislature has authorized communities to borrow for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the State of Ohio, through State appropriations, has made no effort to reimburse or help the welfare work being carried on by the various local communities?

Mr. BULKLEY. Not from State funds. That is one issue which is being raised in the State now. The governor is being urged to call an extra session of the legislature.

With respect to the $21,000,000 deficiency to which I just referred, it is not yet certain that that deficiency can not be supplied by local contributions through the action of the State and the municipal organizations within the State, with the help of local charity. I say it is not certain that it can not be raised, but it is so doubtful that I do not believe the Federal Government should leave such a situation without providing at least the possibility for help in case of urgent necessity.

Mr. President, I believe that the testimony to the effect that local and State aid is not going to be adequate and that serious emergencies are about to arise has been so complete and so convincing that it would be but a repetition for me to go farther along that line. I sincerely hope that the Senate is going to take the view that the situation is bad enough to justify Federal aid.

I turn now to the amendment in the nature of a substitute which is here pending. It is in two parts, one intended to relieve unemployment by employment through an expanded program of road building; the other part a more direct substitute for the pending bill, providing for the advancement by the Federal Government of amounts requisitioned by governors of States, supported by their statements that the funds are necessary for emergency relief and can not be obtained in any other manner.

As to the first part of the bill, the road-building program, I want to invite attention to the fact that it is within the policy already established by the Federal Government and is within the policy commended and advocated by the President of the United States. I refer first to the Wagner Act, approved just one year ago to-morrow, for a declaration of Government policy on this question. I read from that act as follows:

For the purpose of aiding in the prevention of unemployment during periods of business depression and of permitting the Government to avail itself of opportunity for speedy, efficient, and economical construction during such periods, the President may direct the construction agencies to accelerate during such periods, to such extent as is deemed practicable, the prosecution of all authorized construction within their control.

And again:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to arrange the construction of public works so far as practicable in such manner as will assist in the stabilization of industry and employment through the proper timing of such construction, and that to further this object there shall be advance planning, including preparation of detailed construction plans, of public works by the construction agencies and the board.

As to the attitude of the administration on this question I refer to a statement made by the President of the United States about one year ago, on the 3d day of February, 1931. I quote:

In the matter of unemployment outside of the drought areas important economic measures of mutual self-help have been developed, such as those to maintain wages, to distribute employment equitably, to increase construction work by industry, to increase Federal construction work from a rate of about $275,000,000 a year prior to the depression to a rate now of over $750,000,000 a year, to expand State and municipal construction—all upon a scale never before provided or even attempted in any depression.

Again, in his annual message on the 8th of December last, reference is made by the President to the same policy, as follows:

As an aid to unemployment the Federal Government is engaged in the greatest program of public-building, harbor, flood-control, highway, aviation, merchant and naval ship construction in all history. Our expenditures on these works during this calendar year will reach about $780,000,000 compared with $260,000,000 in 1928. Through this increased construction, through the maintenance of a full complement of Federal employes, and through services to veterans, it is estimated that the Federal taxpayer is now directly contributing to the livelihood of 10,000,000 of our citizens.

If we do not adopt an expanded road-construction program or a program providing some other expansion of public works, there will not be expended during the year 1932 anything like the amount of expenditure which the President commended during the year 1931. So the program here suggested is within the policy declared by Congress and within the policy declared and approved by the President.

Now, as to the second part of the program, the advancement of money to States to take care of deficiencies in State and local relief for the hungry and destitute. Like the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] I appeal to the Senators who are the authors of the bill to accept our amendment, lest the splendid work which they have done in showing the necessity for Federal aid be lost by a presidential veto.

Of course, I do not speak for the President; but I have come to the conclusion that a measure like the bill now pending, if not amended, would necessarily be vetoed by him, and I am going to read from official statements of the President so that Senators and citizens may draw their own conclusions. I turn first to a statement which the President made on the 3d of February, a year ago. He was referring to a certain measure then pending before Congress which he characterized as a proposal to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury for charitable purposes, and there is no question but that the pending bill provides for appropriations from the Federal Treasury for charitable purposes. Referring to the measure then pending, he said:

This is not an issue as to whether people shall go hungry or cold in the United States. It is solely a question of the best method by which hunger and cold shall be prevented. It is a question as to whether the American people on one hand will maintain the spirit of charity and mutual self-help through voluntary giving and the responsibility of local government as distinguished on the other hand from appropriations out of the Federal Treasury for such purposes. My own conviction is strongly that if we break down this sense of responsibility of individual generosity to individual and mutual self-help in the country in time of national difficulty and if we start appropriations of this character we have not only impaired something infinitely valuable in the life of the American people but have struck at the roots of self-government. Once this has happened it is not the cost of a few score millions but we are faced with the abyss of reliance in future upon Government charity in some form or other. The money involved is indeed the least of the costs to American ideals and American institutions.

Again in the same statement the President said:

But, after and coincidently with voluntary relief, our American system requires that municipal, county, and State governments shall use their own resources and credit before seeking such assistance from the Federal Treasury.

In another passage in the same statement he said:

I will accredit to those who advocate Federal charity a natural anxiety for the people of their States. I am willing to pledge myself that if the time should ever come that the voluntary agencies of the country, together with the local and State governments, are unable to find resources with which to prevent hunger and suffering in my country I will ask the aid of every resource of the Federal Government, because I would no more see starvation amongst our countrymen than would any Senator or Congressman. I have the faith in the American people that such a day will not come.

The American people are doing their job to-day. They should be given a chance to show whether they wish to preserve the principles of individual and local responsibility and mutual self-help before they embark on what I believe is a disastrous system. I feel sure they will succeed if given the opportunity.

Practically the same opinion is expressed in the annual message of the President of last December, in the following language:

I am opposed to any direct or indirect Government dole. The breakdown and increased unemployment in Europe is due in part to such practices. Our people are providing against distress from unemployment in true American fashion by a magnificent response to public appeal and by action of the local governments.

It is not my purpose to endeavor to interpret the word "dole." I am not terrified by the word, but I am conscious that it is more or less obnoxious to different people, according to their own points of view. I do not have any doubt, however, that the form of Government assistance, the gift of Government money for charitable purposes, as provided in the pending bill, comes within the President's definition of a dole, and is exactly what he intended to condemn by that message.

Whether or not we agree in all respects with what the President has said in those statements, we know that he sincerely believes in what he has said. We know that he has the power to veto what we do, and we know that, unless Federal relief is presented in such form as to avoid the serious objections which he finds, there will be nothing available to feed the hungry and the destitute. I sincerely hope that these expressions of the President, representing as they do the views of a large proportion of the people of the country, and representing the views of the Chief Executive, will have to be respected if anything practical is to be done.

It therefore seems to me necessary, if we believe in actually providing for the relief of suffering, that we must make the provision in such form that it will be available only as a loan and only if the absolute necessity is clearly shown.

In the event the absolute necessity shall arise, the President has indicated in one of the quotations which I have just made that he will not fail to approve cooperation by the Federal Government.

How can we be sure that our appropriations will be safeguarded and will not be used except in the case of real and extreme necessity? Perhaps nothing could be thought of that would be safer than the proposal of the substitute amendment. Under it the governors of the sovereign States are required to ask for help from the Federal Government, and, in asking for it, they are required to make a statement that it is necessary for emergency relief and that funds can not be secured in any other way. If we can not trust the governors of our States we can not know whom to trust. If the governor of a State will make such a certificate or make such a statement to the Secretary of the Treasury, we must presume that the emergency is really at hand, and, whenever it is really at hand, our substitute provides for the availability of the funds with the greatest possible promptness and simplicity. There is no bureaucratic red tape about it. The funds are there to be had upon a very simple statement or certificate by the governor.

I shall say only a few words about the principle involved in the domination of a Federal bureau over State agencies in the administration of emergency relief. We must remember that to-day the local agencies are functioning throughout the land. They have had experience, some of them running over many years and through times both good and bad. They are the agencies that are in touch with the present needs and the present necessities; they are the agencies which necessarily have to carry on. I submit that we can better trust those local agencies which, in turn, are trusted by the people of the States and by the governors of the States, than to presume that a newly organized Federal board can teach those agencies better how to perform their work than they have learned through years of experience.

On the theory of the substitute amendment that the States assume a moral responsibility, which may be enforced later on in the discretion of Congress by withholding advancements for road construction within the respective States, they must be accorded the right and the liberty to administer those funds as they see fit, and we must believe in their competence to do that.

Many years ago Thomas Jefferson said some things about the relation of Federal and State Governments. I quote from him as follows:

> Our citizens have wisely formed themselves into one Nation as to others, and into several States as among themselves. To the united Nation belong our external and mutual relations; to each State severally the care of our persons, our property, our reputations, and religious freedom.

"The care of our persons" is specifically included. It is a State responsibility and not a Federal responsibility.

I quote again from Thomas Jefferson concerning the tendencies of Federal officeholders and the disadvantage accruing from operations conducted by them:

> Our country is too large to have all its affairs directed by a single government. Public servants at such distance, and from under the eye of their constituents, must, from the circumstances of distance, be unable to administer and overlook all the details necessary for the good government of the citizens, and the same circumstances, by rendering detection impossible to their constituents, will invite the public agents to corruption, plunder, and waste.

Mr. President, those statements were made more than 130 years ago. I do not think they can be improved upon to-day. The administration of funds provided in this crisis to help the needy and relieve suffering should be in accordance with those undying principles.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to direct my attention to the question of highway aid by the Federal Government as a factor in the present unemployment situation.

I shall not engage in any assumptions. I shall undertake to discuss the matter from the standpoint of the facts as I gather them from the record.

If we undertake an analysis of Federal aid in highway construction on the basis of percentages, the amount of money that labor receives directly or indirectly, we are simply dealing with delusions and illusions. We need not approach the matter from that standpoint at all. We can approach it from the standpoint of actual experience in the past—no guesswork, no illusions, and no delusions.

Of course, Mr. President, I am in favor of extending more Federal aid in the construction of our highways than is presently available or proposed by the substitute. I am sure Senators are familiar with the fact that the Federal highway aid that now goes to the States embraces only 7 per cent of the post roads of the States; and under the Constitution Congress has the power, and in my opinion it is its duty, to provide for construction and maintenance on all post roads.

However, under the law and under the proposed amendment only 7 per cent of the highways of the respective States are to be affected by the proposed authorization for an appropriation. That alone indicates that Federal-aid construction is not a great factor in the relief of unemployment.

Let us go back to the year 1930. Senators will recall that at that time Congress had increased the Federal aid for highway construction from $75,000,000 annually to $125,000,000 annually, or an increase of $50,000,000.

On December 20, 1930, my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] placed in the RECORD the information that had been furnished him by the Bureau of Roads under the Department of Agriculture, showing that the total number of additional men employed by reason of this $50,000,000 annual increase was only 5,618 men per month.

I repeat, $50,000,000 added 5,618 men per month on an average to the pay roll. I am speaking now of men employed directly in highway construction. The six months for which the report was made were the peak months of highway construction, the months when the largest number of men were employed, with the sole exception of the month of July. The director evidently did not give my colleague the experience for the remainder of that year; but we all know that highway construction is retarded, beginning in the fall and continuing through the winter, until conditions become suitable for highway construction in the spring. At least, that is the situation in the northern tier of States.

Now let us follow this just a little further.

Of the $375,000,000 proposed, and that is to be paid over a period of presumably three years, at least, only $125,000,000 is available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932; but assuming that the whole $375,000,000 were available, on the actual experience of 1930 we would have seven and one-half times as many men employed per month. Seven and a half times $50,000,000 is $375,000,000. That would mean a total of an average of 42,135 additional men per month directly employed in highway construction. It is proposed, however, that only $125,000,000 of the amount shall be used for this year. That is only one-third of the gross sum. So we would have in fact only 14,045 men per month directly engaged in highway construction.

The Director of the Bureau of Roads testified at a hearing before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate in January of this year to this effect (p. 71 of the hearing):

> Mr. MACDONALD. We estimate the equivalent of two persons paid wages indirectly for one person paid wages directly on the road, but the wages are higher.

Accepting that testimony to be a correct statement of the fact, the experience of 1930 demonstrates that all available extra men under the amendment, the unemployed who will be employed directly and indirectly, are only 42,135 men per month. That will be only during the peak of construction, and there will be a diminishing number during the remainder of the year.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator will observe in the bill that they are permitted to spend $125,000,000 between now and July 1. The Senator will also understand that in order for the road funds to be expended between now and July it would probably be a fair average to say that the expenditure would begin on April 1. Probably the Senator thinks it might be longer; but, that being true, we would have the months of April, May, and June, or a period of three months. I have been informed by the Highway Department—as I stated to the Senator, I can not vouch for its absolute credibility—that this $125,000,000 would employ over a million men for one month; and for three months it would, therefore, employ three hundred and some odd thousand.

Of course, if it were to be extended until January 1, then it would be a smaller number; but I simply desired to call the Senator's attention to the fact that they are permitted to spend it between now and July 1.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course, from now until April 1 is a long time for a man who is starving to wait for something to eat.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator absolutely; but if the bill which the Senator is evidently speaking for becomes the law, the bureau, with its red tape, will not have to issue a dollar to feed a starving person until 60 days after all the red tape has been complied with in any State of the Union.

Mr. BLAINE. If that is the Senator's objection to the bill, I respectfully suggest that he shorten the time.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that to attempt to shorten the time of a bureau's action is to attempt an impossible task. That, however, is simply one of the objections.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am not going to be drawn from the course I have set for my remarks by a discussion of the bureaus and departments. I do not know what the Director of the Bureau of Roads stated to the Senator from Alabama, but I do know that the experience of 1930 shows that under the $50,000,000 additional appropriation there were directly employed, on an average, 5,618 men per month for six months. Those were the months of April, May, June, August, September, and October.

Now, let me turn to a more recent experience.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Did I understand the Senator in his last statement to say that the road department reported that that $50,000,000 enabled them to employ 42,000 men per month? Is that what the Senator said?

Mr. BLAINE. No. I should have added, taking the statement of the Director of the Bureau of Roads on the experience of 1930, the $375,000,000 additional under this bill would employ 42,135 men per month for six months.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator would not really take the whole $375,000,000 to employ 42,000 men?

Mr. BLAINE. That is spread over three years, Mr. President.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; I see.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I want to make myself clear. I do not want to repeat; but it is a matter of multiplication and division. The Bureau of Roads reported the number of additional men employed, due to the $50,000,000 appropriation. The total of those men for the six months, of course, is not what was employed, but it was the average per month that was employed. That was 5,618 men; and if we take the $375,000,000, we have seven and one-half times as much money available, that would equal 42,135 men; that is, 42,135 men on an average per month. But there is available only one-third of that, so that leaves 14,045 on an average per month.

I have been speaking of the men employed directly. The Bureau of Roads states that it stands 2 to 1. Therefore all of the men who would be employed, directly and indirectly, accepting the experience of 1930, under the increase provided in the proposed amendment of $125,000,000, would be 42,135 men per month.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I remember a very interesting discussion in this body a great many years ago, in which it was disclosed that a certain department of the Government was asked for some information by one Senator, and he got the information and gave it to the Senate. The same department was asked for the same information by another Member of the Senate, and he got quite a different result. It was proposed that the Senate average up the two to find out what the fact was.

I called attention a little while ago to the testimony of Mr. MacDonald, the gentleman to whom the Senator is now adverting, in which he stated:

> In the first six months of 1931 a program, Federal-aid program, was started, of $256,000,000, and that employed during the peak months just a little short of 400,000 men.

That is a little better than one and one-half men per thousand dollars. If that is the case, $50,000,000 would put about 75,000 men to work.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if the Senator will just for a moment observe the table on page 74 of the recent hearings——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have it before me.

Mr. BLAINE. He will find that the Chief of the Bureau of Roads was talking about a stage army when he gave the total. These men under this table have marched past twelve times, and the 400,000 to whom he referred during the peak month was 389,949 men. That was the grand total of men employed under forest, park, Federal aid, and State aid for the peak month.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Whatever it was, it was one and one-half men per thousand.

Mr. BLAINE. We do not know how much money of the total was spent during that month.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This is a 6-month program.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator must appreciate that this larger number of men produced a larger program, and that whole program was spread out over the whole year. He will find that in January of the same year there were only 148,600 men employed. The Chief of the Bureau of Roads was talking, in the paragraph the Senator quoted, of the total number of men employed by the Federal Government and State governments for the peak month of construction, and that would be the peak month of payment out of the total fund. So the Senator can not make a comparison respecting the number per thousand unless he has the exact number of dollars that were paid out during that month.

The Senator from Montana made a very interesting comment, in which he referred to the head of a department giving information to one Senator and different information to another Senator. I had that in mind, so I undertook to carry out a little problem of proving or disproving the statements submitted. I went to the testimony given by the Director of the Bureau of Roads before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads only recently. Senators will find on page 74 a statement as to the number of men engaged each month under the regular Federal-aid appropriation. That is, giving now the experience of the department in 1931, the regular appropriation was $125,000,000. The emergency appropriation was $80,000,000.

Under the regular appropriation there was expended, according to the table on page 73, $121,404,000. That $121,000,000 was used as Federal aid, known as the regular aid, not the emergency aid.

If Senators will add up the total number of men employed for the 12 months of 1931 under the regular aid appropriation, they will find that the average number of men employed in 1931 under the $121,000,000 appropriation was 35,438. That was the average, and that is the only way by which we can determine how many men are going to be employed under this present appropriation.

I assume these are facts. I assume that the director of roads, when he inserted the table in his testimony, was telling the truth. He did not tell it to one Senator, he told it to all Senators, and he told it to everybody who desired to read the table. These seem to be uncontroverted facts, facts which can not be broken down by any suggestion.

Let us do a little figuring on the experience of 1931. Under the regular program, with a little over $121,000,000 expended, there were employed per month an average of 35,438 men directly on Federal-aid projects. Three hundred and seventy-five million dollars is three and a half times $121,000,000 in round numbers.

We can take a shorter course than pursuing it along that line, however. I prefer to make myself perfectly clear and have the RECORD clear. If the whole $375,000,000 was expended on the basis of the experience of 1931, there would be employed directly 106,314 men per month. But it is proposed to expend only one-third of the $375,000,000 for 1932, and therefore we go back to the figure I originally stated, 35,438 men per month, directly employed.

Assuming that there are two men indirectly employed to one man directly employed, under the $121,000,000 expenditures on regular Federal-aid projects, there were employed 106,314 men per month, directly and indirectly. When we are speaking of employment indirectly, we must go back to the concrete mills, we must go back to the raw materials which go to the concrete mills, we must go to the stone quarries, to the gravel pits, to the lime kilns; we must go back to all those, and to the railroads. When gentlemen speak of indirectly employed men they include presidents, managers of corporations which have charge of cement mills, railroads, aggregate supplies, and all other corporations furnishing any material whatsoever. Those are included in the 2 to 1 proposition.

Let us make a little check to see how nearly Mr. MacDonald, the Chief of the Bureau of Roads, told the truth when he reported to my colleague and when he reported before the committee. In making this check I find that he was correct almost to the fraction, and it is easy of computation. On the basis of the experience of 1931, with an expenditure of $121,000,000 of the regular highway fund, there were employed 106,314 men as an average per month, directly and indirectly. Mr. MacDonald has made no mistake respecting that proposition.

Take the basis of the experience of 1930 and the report Mr. MacDonald made to my colleague, and Senators will find almost the same result. The $121,000,000 expended in 1931 is two and four-tenths times the $50,000,000 expended in 1930. Therefore, we have the result that under the experiences of 1930, on the basis of the amount to which I have referred, there would have been employed, directly and indirectly, 101,124 men per month on an average. Taking identically the same basis and the statement of the Director of the Bureau of Roads, under the program of 1931 there would be employed 106,314 men, on an average, per month, directly and indirectly, and Mr. MacDonald explains very clearly to my mind that there would have been more men employed in 1931 than there were in 1930, out of the same identical appropriations, because of the fact that wages were higher in 1930 than 1931, thus accounting for the few thousand difference in the number of men employed on the average per month. So Mr. MacDonald, the Chief of the Bureau of Roads, has not told my colleague one thing and put in the record another thing, or told some other Senator a different thing. When we check on the report he has made respecting the number of men employed under the appropriation to which I have referred, we find that his statements are correct—at least, as nearly correct as the magnitude of the highway projects permits.

Mr. President, from the standpoint of emergency relief, the $125,000,000 that is to come out of the $375,000,000 will employ but very few of the total unemployed. Therefore, I do not consider the amendment respecting highway improvement important from the standpoint of the relief of unemployment. I do consider it important from the standpoint of what the Federal Government ought to consider in the building of post roads under the Constitution of the United States. So may I suggest to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] that if they will strike out all of their amendment, excepting the provision relating to additional funds for Federal-aid highway construction, I shall be very glad to support it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask to have it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understood that we have an agreement for an executive session at this hour.

Mr. McNARY. No, Mr. President; the agreement is in form merely an understanding——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no such unanimous-consent agreement of record.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I was explaining, there is no unanimous-consent agreement. Of course, no one understands that there is. There was merely an understanding that we would this afternoon take up the nominations for the Tariff Commission, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were appropriately referred.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Sheppard
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bailey	Dale	Keyes	Smith
Bankhead	Dickinson	King	Smoot
Barbour	Dill	La Follette	Steiwer
Barkley	Fess	Lewis	Stephens
Bingham	Fletcher	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Black	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Blaine	George	McKellar	Townsend
Borah	Glass	McNary	Trammell
Bratton	Glenn	Metcalf	Tydings
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Morrison	Vandenberg
Broussard	Gore	Moses	Wagner
Bulkley	Hale	Neely	Walcott
Bulow	Hastings	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Byrnes	Hatfield	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Capper	Hawes	Oddie	Waterman
Caraway	Hayden	Patterson	Watson
Carey	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Howell	Reed	White
Coolidge	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Costigan	Jones	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance I report back favorably the nomination of Hon. Ogden L. Mills, of New York, to be Secretary of the Treasury, vice Andrew W. Mellon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Ogden L. Mills, of New York, to be Secretary of the Treasury, vice Andrew W. Mellon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not know of any reason why we should make an exception of this nomination. I think it ought to go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator object?

Mr. NORRIS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT also, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Arthur A. Ballantine, of New York, to be Under Secretary of the Treasury, vice Ogden L. Mills, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nomination of Gerald A. Jewett, of Des Moines, Iowa, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Iowa in place of Lars E. Bladine, resigned, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Fred A. Bradley, of Buffalo, N. Y., to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 9, with headquarters at Buffalo, N. Y. (reappointment), which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Charles A. Patton, of Colorado, to be United States marshal, district of Colorado, to succeed Richard A. Callen, whose term expired February 14, 1931, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

TREATIES

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask that the treaties on the calendar may go over, at the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations for the Federal Farm Board.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I hope these nominations can be disposed of this week. I have an understanding to that effect with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. I ask that for the present the nominations may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be passed over.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Ira M. Ornburn to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission for the remainder of the term expiring June 16, 1933.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I expect to be called out of the Chamber in a few moments, and for that reason I ask him to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I yield.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE ARMY

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the same request with regard to Army nominations.

The Chief Clerk read sundry nominations of officers in the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and these nominations are confirmed.

GEORGE A. MAUK

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I make a similar request respecting the nomination of George A. Mauk to be United States marshal, district of Arizona. I ask that it be confirmed at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination is confirmed. That completes the calendar, except the nominations to the United States Tariff Commission.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION—IRA M. ORNBURN

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is the nomination of Mr. Ornburn before the Senate now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice, and I suppose the Senate takes notice of the fact, that these nominations have been confirmed and taken up out of their order on the ground, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] stated, that Senators were expecting to be compelled to leave the Chamber soon.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Not just now. All Senators were aware of the fact that I probably had something to say about the Ornburn nomination.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to yield to me.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. ASHURST. I am remaining because the senior Senator from Nebraska is going to speak. That is the one reason why I am going to remain.

Mr. NORRIS. I am sorry that even the Senator from Arizona is going to be disappointed. Senators need not leave the Chamber, because I expect to occupy only a few moments.

Mr. President, I have no personal acquaintance with the nominee, Mr. Ornburn. I have no personal knowledge as to any of the serious charges which have been made against him. I have no ill will; I have no interest whatever in the nomination except the interest that we all have and that the country has.

The Tariff Commission is an exceedingly important and powerful body, and its duties bring it into direct contact with the interests of all classes of people. Therefore, we should make no mistake if we can possibly avoid it.

So, Mr. President, I am going to make a motion that this nomination be recommitted to the committee. I do that because, in my judgment, the committee has not made a sufficient investigation of the fitness of this nominee. I want to be perfectly fair, and say that it may be that all the charges that have been sent to me and that I have read as having been sent to other Senators are unfounded; I am not backing up any of them, but they come from apparently well-authenticated sources. One thing I do not like about them is that most of them are confidential, and for various reasons the persons making them do not want their names used, at the present time at least, on the floor of the Senate. I realize that that takes away a great deal of the force of any objection, and were it not for the fact that various letters and telegrams that I have seen in regard to this nominee apparently come from a very high class of people—the communications are well written—and from people who apparently on the face of things are well acquainted with conditions, I would not make any suggestion regarding the nomination.

I do not want to discuss at this time, if it can possibly be avoided, the charges themselves. I think most Senators know what they are or have a general idea of their nature, and for fear that they might not be substantiated on investigation I prefer not to go into them. It seems to me, however—and I have talked with several members of the committee who have agreed with me—that this nomination ought to be recommitted to the committee so that an opportunity may be afforded to examine into it.

For instance, I have to-day a telegram in which it is said:

A Connecticut newspaper is investigating serious and apparently reliable statements connecting Mr. Ornburn—

With various things that are set out.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I want to say that there were no important charges made against Mr. Ornburn in the Finance Committee. The only charges made were, first, that his Democracy might be questioned——

Mr. NORRIS. I have no interest in that charge, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. We on our side did not have any interest in it, either.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no interest in that whatever.

Mr. WATSON. Secondly, that he was at least appointed with the understanding that he was the representative of labor. That question was raised before the committee, but we disposed of both of those alleged charges, if I may use the term, to the entire satisfaction of the members of the committee. If there be any charges against him aside from those two, they were not made plain to the committee at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no interest in the second charge. I understand that this nominee is a union-labor man and is backed by labor, although that is contradicted by a great many labor men. It is not sufficient to put a man on the Tariff Commission because he is a labor man; that does not qualify him for the position. I do not suppose anyone will question the fact that I have, I think, always been a consistent friend of union labor; but, if I thought he was unfit, I would not permit a nominee in the case of an office of this kind to be confirmed, if I could prevent it, although he was backed by all the labor men in the United States. I am not even saying, as I hope Senators will understand, that he is unfit, but I am saying that if half of what is said about him in the letters that I have read is true, then he is unfit and his nomination ought not to be confirmed. He might be fit for some other position, but not for this one.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate that I do not know of any nomination that ever came before the Finance Committee with a greater number of indorsements from labor organizations, officials of States, and business men of affairs. I do not know of anyone since I have been a member of the Finance Committee that had a longer string of indorsements than had Mr. Ornburn.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is quite probable that he does have such indorsements; I have not seen them; but from the very nature of the case he would be, I presume, and is indorsed by labor unions from all parts of the country, by men who never knew him before, because he is a labor candidate; and that is perfectly natural.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. I have already yielded to the Senator from Utah. I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut when the Senator from Utah has concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Connecticut desires to ask a question, I will yield to him.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, does the Senator not know that Mr. Ornburn was indorsed by the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor, by men who not only knew him but who worked with him for years, and who have the highest regard for his ability?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. BINGHAM. However, that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. That all may be true.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is in the record.

Mr. NORRIS. I do know that a great many labor men—and I have had letters from some of them—have told me of the manner in which many of these indorsements were obtained, and under what circumstances they were obtained, and upon due consideration they are opposed to him and do not themselves believe that he ought to be confirmed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Since the Senator is so interested in opposing this nominee, how could it happen that he did not read in the RECORD of February 5 the letter from William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, addressed to the Vice President, saying:

> Mr. PRESIDENT: I am writing to advise you that the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, which is now meeting at the headquarters of the American Federation of Labor in this city, unanimously indorsed the appointment of Mr. I. M. Ornburn as a member of the United States Tariff Commission.
> I am directed by the executive council to write you, earnestly requesting that the Members of the United States Senate vote in favor of the confirmation of the appointment of Mr. Ornburn. The members of the executive council have known Mr. Ornburn for many years.

The Senator from Nebraska replies that the labor people backing him do not know him. To go on with Mr. Green's letter:

> He has been prominent in the councils of the American Federation of Labor and is held in high esteem and high regard by his associates.
> We feel that his training in the field of labor and his knowledge of wages and the relations of wages to tariff schedules fit him in a very large way to serve with distinction and honor as a member of the United States Tariff Commission.
> Respectfully submitted.
> WM. GREEN,
> President American Federation of Labor.

Surely, Mr. President, that ought to persuade the Senator that the labor men who are backing Mr. Ornburn are not people who do not know him.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator has finished, let me say, taking the statement as he has read it, that the members of the executive council knew Mr. Ornburn personally, I wonder if Mr. Green ever saw him? There is nothing in the letter to indicate that he ever did; there is nothing in it to show that Mr. Green ever read a thing the nominee ever wrote or knew of anything he ever did or heard anything he ever said. The Senator from Connecticut wonders why I have not read that letter. Well, I arrived in the city to-day a little before 12 o'clock. That is the reason I have not read it.

I congratulate labor in the United States on its new champion, the Senator from Connecticut. He is willing to swallow this man just because labor wants him. That is a new step he is taking in his official and public career as a statesman in this great body.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, is it a fair question to ask the Senator from Nebraska, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, if he is opposing the nominee merely because labor wants him appointed?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is a fair question; but from what I have said everyone knows that I am not opposing him; I have stated I do not know anything about this nominee; but he is nominated here for one of the most important places under the United States Government, and there are charges made, as this newspaper telegram says, apparently well authenticated——

Mr. BINGHAM. What newspaper is it from?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know—a prominent Connecticut newspaper.

Mr. BINGHAM. Are all the Senator's newspaper communications and letters anonymous as well?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not all of them.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not the Senator know what newspaper it was?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not. Unfortunately, I do not read Connecticut newspapers; there are too many of them, and they stand for the same things that the Senator stands for, and I can not waste my time on them.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is quite true that all of them, with but one exception, are in favor of this nomination, and that exception is not a creditable one, and if the Senator knew a little more about Connecticut newspapers, that he is now trying to talk about, he would appreciate that fact.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, as a Member of this body trying to do his duty, these charges have been coming to me by wire and by letter, some from men who confess they are afraid to give their names and have their names made public. One reason they give for the charges, a reason that heretofore I have paid no attention to, is that a great political conspiracy is behind this nomination. I never had a suspicion in my mind that there was any foundation for it, and I paid no attention to it, as I have said, until the Senator from Connecticut comes to the defense of a labor man. It is the greatest curiosity that I have seen for many a day.

Mr. President, I have not any interest in this matter, but if it will do the Senator from Connecticut any good or be any satisfaction to him, I will say to him that neither Mr. Green nor all the organizations of labor in the United States have any more control over my vote than anyone else. I am almost invariably in sympathy with what they are trying to do, but my vote is my own, and if they favor for important public office somebody as to whom it seems to me it is our duty to make a further investigation in order to ascertain whether or not he is qualified, I want that investigation made, no matter who is behind the nominee.

Mr. MOSES and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me to add to the anomaly of which he has spoken, let me say that I, too, hope that Mr. Ornburn may be confirmed, not because I know him, for I do not know him any better than does the Senator from Nebraska, but because I am wholly unwilling, upon the basis of anonymous charges such as those suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, to have a nomination recommitted to a committee which has already given it consideration. The fears of people in Connecticut lest their names may become known are the fears of assassins.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not know they had any such people in New England.

Mr. MOSES. Not in northern New England.

Mr. NORRIS. If they have them in Connecticut, they may escape some day and get over into New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Our frontiers are guarded.

Mr. NORRIS. But they are not sufficiently guarded to prevent a bandit from Connecticut getting over into New Hampshire, I suppose.

Mr. MOSES. Well, they would have to travel through two States, before they got there.

Mr. NORRIS. It appears, then, that the Senator must be aware of the fact that they have such desperate characters in Connecticut that it is necessary to guard the boundary line of New Hampshire to keep that State from being contaminated by an exodus which it is feared might go out of Connecticut.

Mr. MOSES. On the contrary, the Senator from Nebraska, as usual, misunderstands me. When I said the "fear of assassins," I meant the fear of assassins who lurk somewhere in the outskirts and do not wish themselves to be known.

Mr. NORRIS. As I have heretofore said, ninety-nine times out of a hundred I pay no attention to anonymous communications, but there are many instances where anonymous communications, coming from men who for their own protection did not want it known that they were opposing this or favoring that, have resulted, upon investigation, in the establishment of the truth which they alleged. I want to say, Mr. President, that I have made what I believe to be only a fair request, for it has been admitted by a member of the committee that the various charges contained in these communications have not been investigated by the committee. If the nomination were recommitted, it would be no disrespect to the committee. Nominations have been recommitted to the committee of which I am a member very often. If I thought a complete investigation or a fair one had not been made, I never objected to it. But now there immediately comes the suggestion, "Why, this man is recommended by union labor and must be confirmed." That may be sufficient reason for some; it is not for me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was just about to say, in the time of the Senator from Nebraska, that those of us who have not seen the charges to which he has referred labor under a very great disadvantage.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize they do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So far as I know, no such or similar communications have been received at my office. It is quite difficult to determine what action should be taken until the basis of the charges and the nature of the charges are made known.

Of course, it appeals to me very forcefully that the real question to be determined in a case of this kind is the fitness and qualifications of the candidate—whether he measures up to the standard fixed by the statute. If there are charges which involve moral turpitude, or charges which question his capacity to perform the functions of this office in an efficient manner, those charges ought to be investigated.

Mr. NORRIS. And they ought to be investigated by a committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not even want to make them on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WATSON and Mr. MOSES addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not yield to more than one Senator at a time.

Mr. MOSES. I should like to make a privileged motion.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator yield for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business in secret session, in order that the Senator may disclose these charges? We do not know what they are.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate desires to take that course, I have no objection.

Mr. MOSES. That is the motion I wanted to make.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is quite unwilling to make the charges in open session; and in order that we may vote intelligently on the Senator's motion, certainly he is entitled to present them to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the Senate taking that course.

Mr. WATSON. Then I make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the motion seconded.

Mr. REED. I second the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate, with closed doors, proceeded to consider the nomination. After 40 minutes the doors were reopened.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, following the meeting of the Finance Committee at which the nominations of Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Ornburn were considered I made the following statement which I desire to repeat for RECORD purposes:

After full consideration, I have concluded that it is my duty to withhold official approval from the two nominations for the Tariff Commission. My vote will be cast against both.

Without attempting to impose my convictions on any other person, it may perhaps be suggested that after a number of years of association with the Tariff Commission and its problems I am to some extent acquainted with both. Incidentally the ability of the commission to function will not be impaired and there will be some slight economy if the present nominees are not approved.

The issue is not personal but public. It is at last almost universally recognized that more liberal commerce is of basic importance to the prosperity, peace, and happiness of the world. Yet constantly the United States and other nations, through tariff legislation and tariff commissions, are pressing forward in the race toward higher and in the long run war-inviting tariff barriers. There is no way to improve this unhappy situation except by changing our course.

There is nothing personal in this reference to the two nominees, except that in my judgment they will not correct the less than first-class reputation of the commission for scientific disinterestedness.

I hope before long to discuss before the Senate the public aspects of the tariff and the Tariff Commission. Suffice it to say at this time that it would usually appear not to be in the public interest to confirm Tariff Commission nominations until President Hoover undertakes to fulfill the hopes with respect to that commission held out in 1930 and demonstrates his determination genuinely and thoroughly to reorganize the commission in accordance with independent, impartial, and scientific standards, with a view to which the commission was originally created.

May I add, Mr. President, what every Member of this body knows, that when the United States Tariff Commission was originally created it was designed to be an independent and disinterested fact-finding governmental agency. More recently the disposition of those supporting appointments has been to seek representatives of the two major political parties who will present, in opposition to each other, the respective views of such political parties. The commission, as now constituted, is regarded by many as a proper public forum if it has commissioners on the one side representing high-tariff views and commissioners on the other side representing moderate or low-tariff views. We have seriously departed from the original conception of the Tariff Commission. Because of this unfortunate change of policy, as well as on the other grounds assigned, I desire my vote to be recorded against both nominees before the Senate to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on advising and consenting to the nomination of Ira M. Ornburn to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission for the remainder of the term expiring June 16, 1933. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I promised to take care of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] during his absence. I do not know how he would vote on this nomination. Therefore I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, however, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. Upon inquiry, I am advised that that Senator would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. VANDENBERG (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], who is unavoidably absent. I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BARKLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I understand that if present he would vote as I have already voted. Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES. I find I can transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I do so and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business in attendance upon the sessions of the peace conference at Geneva, Switzerland.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the following general pair:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

The result was announced—yeas 70, nays 9, as follows:

So the Senate advised and consented to the nomination of Ira M. Ornburn to be a member of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the testimony of Mr. Ornburn before the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Since the Senator himself wanted to go into closed executive session and he offered that in executive session, he ought to stand by the closed executive session action, and I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The clerk will call the next number on the calendar.

ROBERT LINCOLN O'BRIEN

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Robert Lincoln O'Brien to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to this nomination? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Senate advises and consents to the nomination.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Frank P. Light to be register, land office, Lakeview, Oreg.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Guy Francis Barnes to be register, land office, Pierre, S. Dak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed. That completes the Executive Calendar.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate returned to legislative session and resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McNARY. I yield the floor to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 10, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, be near all who are prosperous and happy and take not their blessings away. Let their songs of joyous life continue; but, Heavenly Father, may they break forth, cheering the lives of others, lifting their burdens as they struggle on these days. As on they go looking downward, wearying along the road, waiting for the night to come, bless them and help them. To those who have been blessed with the tokens of complacency, ease, and luxury, deliver them from all ignoble views of life. O let Thy Spirit pervade their very souls; and where the night reigned, let the star rise, and may they hear no longer just the babble of self-interest. Teach all mortals that Thy truth is a strange commodity—the more that is sent away, the more there is at home. In the name of the world's Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

On January 27, 1932:

H. J. Res. 230. Joint resolution making an appropriation to enable the United States of America to make payments upon subscriptions to the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

On February 2, 1932:

H. J. Res. 251. Joint resolution making an appropriation for expenses of participation by the United States in the general disarmament conference at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1932;

H. J. Res. 261. Joint resolution making an appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay for subscriptions to the capital stock of Federal land banks; and

H. R. 6660. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and for other purposes.

On February 4, 1932:

H. R. 6596. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 12. Concurrent resolution to authorize the Committee on Finance to have printed additional copies of the hearings on sale of foreign bonds or securities in the United States.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, announced that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 149. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River at or near The Dalles, Oreg.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did, on February 8, 1932, present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 70. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Board of County Commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio, to construct a free overhead viaduct across the Mahoning River at Struthers, Mahoning County, Ohio;

H. R. 225. An act providing for payment of $25 to each enrolled Chippewa Indian of Minnesota from the funds standing to their credit in the Treasury of the United States;

H. R. 4696. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River southerly from the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation at or near the point known and designated as the Power-site Crossing, in the State of Montana;

H. R. 5131. An act to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La.;

H. R. 5471. An act authorizing Sullivan County, Ind., to construct, maintain, and operate a public toll bridge across the Wabash River at a point in said county to a point opposite on the Illinois shore;

H. R. 5478. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La.;

H. R. 5626. An act authorizing the States of Minnesota and North Dakota, the county of Polk, Minn., the county of Grand Forks, N. Dak., or any one or more of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Red River of the North at or near Bygland, Minn.;

H. R. 5878. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission and the Missouri Pacific Railroad Co. and the Louisiana & Arkansas Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a combination highway and railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La.;

H. R. 6663. An act to reserve certain land on the public domain in Utah for addition to the Skull Valley Indian Reservation;

H. R. 7225. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Board of County Commissioners of Allegheny County, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Monongahela River between the city of Pittsburgh and the borough of Homestead, Pa.; and

H. R. 7248. An act authorizing the modification of the existing project for the Willamette River between Oregon City and Portland, Oreg.

SURPLUS ARMY CLOTHING

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I am requested by the chairman [Mr. McSWAIN] to make a brief statement for the information of the Members.

At a recent meeting of the committee there appeared a delegation from the American Legion making request to our committee for some reasonable disposition of surplus Army clothing to the needy and unemployed. After an exhaustive hearing on the subject the committee made a recommendation to the War Department which has been accepted.

There are several millions of dollars' worth of surplus Army clothing on hand in warehouses all over the country bought during the World War. The rehabilitation committee of the American Legion made the request that this clothing be sold at a very nominal price through the American Legion and distributed among the needy throughout the country. To that end the committee unanimously requested of the War Department a reduction in current prices of 50 per cent, which prices were already very low. The committee thought it would be inadvisable to try to undertake any legislation on the subject because the winter would probably be over by the time the necessary legislation was passed, and there is great need right now for this assistance. The current price quoted by the War Department for this surplus clothing, if I may illustrate, was 40 cents for a suit of woolen underwear, 50 cents for a pair of shoes, and 6 cents for a pair of socks. On the recommendation of the committee those prices were reduced 50 per cent, certainly making a very nominal price for these articles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. This would mean 3 cents for a pair of woolen socks, 20 cents for a first-class suit of woolen underwear, 25 cents for a pair of good Army shoes, and other prices in the same proportion.

The plan of the War Department is—and I am giving this for the information of the House, so that the Members may act accordingly—that this clothing shall be distributed through the corps area commanders of the respective districts, and also application may be made to the governors of the respective States. The War Department, I am sure it is unnecessary to say, will so safeguard the distribution of this clothing that it will be equitably distributed throughout the different States and where the need is most felt.

With your permission, I will read the acknowledgment received this morning by the committee from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 8, 1932.

Hon. JOHN J. McSWAIN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. McSWAIN: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of February 4, with which you inclosed a resolution adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs suggesting that the Secretary of War sell surplus clothing to charitable organizations for the relief of the needy at prices equal to 50 per cent of the prices now prevailing.

Your letter and this resolution have received the very careful consideration of the War Department, and I am happy to say that your suggestion is acceptable to me and to the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Payne, and that appropriate instructions will be issued immediately to all corps area commanders.

With very kindest regards, I am, sincerely yours,

PATRICK J. HURLEY,
Secretary of War.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the money received be turned back to the Treasury?

Mr. THOMASON. Yes. The American Legion posts throughout the country have some funds and they expect to undertake to secure further money. Of course, those posts, both large and small, even with a small amount of money, can provide quite a lot of clothing under these conditions for distribution among suffering people in their immediate communities.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the statement which the gentleman has filed in the RECORD show what clothing is available for distribution?

Mr. THOMASON. The War Department will be glad to furnish that information.

Mr. SNELL. But that is not shown in the department's letter?

Mr. THOMASON. No; it is not in the letter, but the committee had available a list of the clothing that is of practical use, such as overcoats, socks, woolen underwear, shoes, gloves, and caps, of all of which there is a very large quantity. They are the principal things and the kind most needed.

Mr. SNELL. As the committee has that information, why would it not be a good idea to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMASON. I will be very glad to do so. The rehabilitation committee of the American Legion had previously taken this up with the War Department, and that is what brought about this request from the committee for a reduction in prices.

Mr. MONTET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. Yes.

Mr. MONTET. Will the gentleman state for the benefit of the membership whether relief organizations other than the American Legion will have the privilege of this reduced price?

Mr. THOMASON. I may say that although this action was inspired by the American Legion and our committee was strong in its commendation of the splendid work being done by that great organization, yet the committee in its recommendation to the Secretary of War asked that other relief organizations, approved by the War Department, also have the privilege of availing themselves of this clothing. This clothing will be distributed to the needy regardless of whether or not they are ex-service men. I am making this statement for the benefit of the Members so that they may act accordingly. They can get information through the rehabilitation committee of the American Legion or through the War Department. The application for these clothes will, I understand, be made to the corps area commanders in each district, and likewise to the governors of the different States. I can not too highly praise the fine and unselfish service being done by the American Legion to relieve suffering throughout the country. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may extend his remarks by including certain data in possession of the Military Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may extend his remarks by including certain data in possession of the Military Affairs Committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to explain in more detail the plan whereby certain surplus Army clothing purchased during the World War is to be sold to the American Legion and other organizations to be used for relief purposes.

The classes of clothing available and the prices at which they will be sold are as follows:

Caps	$0.10
Woolen underwear	.20
Shoes	.25
Gloves	.10
Mittens (canton flannel)	.02½
Overcoats	1.00
Leggings	.05
Socks (wool; heavy)	.03
Breeches (wool; new)	.25
Breeches (wool; reclaimed)	.12½

Prices quoted for shoes, gloves, leggins, and socks are for pairs and the price on underwear is for a 2-piece suit. All of the clothing is unused, except in the one instance specified. Under these prices a man can be comfortably outfitted for $2.

The rehabilitation committee of the American Legion recently requested the Committee on Military Affairs to make some reasonable disposition of the surplus supplies of Army clothing so that the Nation's needy could have the use of it. A thorough investigation of the whole plan was made by the committee, after which it recommended to the War Department that a reduction of 50 per cent be made in the prices, which were already low.

The resolution of the committee is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Committee on Military Affairs that surplus clothing supplies be sold by the Secretary of War to the American Legion and to such other relief organizations as the Secretary of War may recognize as coming within the terms of the law at prices of 50 per cent below the prices stated to this committee by the Assistant Secretary of War at the meeting of said committee on February 2, 1932.

Under date of February 4, 1932, the Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN, chairman of the committee, transmitted the resolution to the Secretary with the following statement:

While I recognize that this resolution has no force of law whatsoever, I am informed and persuaded to believe that it will be accepted as advisory and persuasive in inducing you and the Assistant Secretary of War to sell surplus clothing supplies under existing law at prices representing 50 per cent of the prevailing prices already fixed by you.

If my impression and belief be justified, I shall be pleased to have a reply from you to that effect immediately, and if it be as I anticipate, then no further efforts at legislation will be necessary, and, so far as I am concerned, no further efforts at legislation will be made. I believe that all who have thought of legislation will be happy if you will accept this suggestion of the committee.

In reply thereto Mr. MCSWAIN received a letter from the Hon. Patrick J. Hurley, Secretary of War, reading in part, as follows:

Your letter and this resolution have received the very careful consideration of the War Department, and I am happy to say that your suggestion is acceptable to me and to the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Payne, and that appropriate instructions will be issued immediately to all corps area commanders.

I am informed by the Secretary that he has so instructed the corps area commanders and that arrangements are such now that the Legion posts and other approved relief agencies can take immediate steps to secure the clothing for the needy of their communities.

Under the terms of the plan the relief agencies must be certified to the corps area commanders by the governors of the respective States. It was felt that such precautions should be taken to prevent organizations that could not or would not distribute this clothing to the actual needy persons from obtaining it, as well as prevent reselling or profiteering. After the governor of a State has approved an organization it may place its order with the corps area commander. He will transmit it to Washington. The clothing will be sent from one of the 15 depots scattered throughout the country where it is now held.

I am assured that every effort will be made to promptly ship the clothing from the nearest depot, but that the orders must be handled through Washington on account of the fact that all sizes of clothing of the various kinds are not available at all depots. The War Department will make no charge for handling, but the Legion post or other agency must pay the actual cost of transportation.

The clothing is all in excellent condition, I am informed, and is of the kind which will be most valuable in relieving suffering of unemployed men. Most of it is available in a wide range of sizes, with the exception of shoes. Unfortunately, the shoes left in these surplus stocks are mostly of very small or very large sizes.

The War Department and Legion agree to see to it that only the needy and deserving receive these clothes. Merchants will not suffer because the unemployed have no money with which to buy. The Government has these clothes on hand, which sooner or later must be disposed of in some way, and certainly there was never a time when they could be put to better use. It can not be said this is a dole. Many men will not accept charity. Under this plan a man will receive aid from his buddies and friends, and suffer no humiliation.

The American Legion deserves the credit for fostering this plan, which I consider a very sound one and which I am convinced will do a lot to relieve suffering in many parts of the United States. The plan is not limited to Legion posts, however, and it is the intention of those sponsoring it that the beneficiaries be given this relief whether they are veterans or not. In most cities and towns the Legion is undoubtedly organized to carry on this work efficiently, but in communities where it can not undertake it, other organizations should avail themselves of the privilege of buying this stock of clothing for the needy at prices which are very nominal.

I feel that the prices are so low that the benefits of the plan may extend to every city and town in the country. A Legion post, or any other approved relief organization, by raising a sum as small as $50 may buy enough clothing to care for a sizeable group of jobless men. It is far better that this clothing be used to benefit some of our millions of unemployed than that it remain unusued in Army warehouses. The committee was assured by the War Department that the stocks offered for sale are surplus, and that this plan in no way affects the clothing kept as reserve stock for the Army. The money paid for the clothing will go to the United States Treasury.

It is to be hoped that all Members of Congress will lend their Legion posts every assistance in acquiring information about this plan, to the end that the clothing may be fairly distributed in all those sections of the country where it is needed and that the distribution may be made quickly before the winter is over. The supply of some of the items is limited, but I believe that there is a sufficient amount offered to care for the demand. Legion posts and the other agencies which desire to take advantage of the plan should communicate at once with their corps area commanders and with the governors of their States. I would urge them to estimate their actual requirements carefully so that the supply can be distributed equitably throughout all the States and in the communities where the need is greatest.

The Legion has rendered the country a patriotic and unselfish service in sponsoring this program, and I can not too highly praise the great work it is doing for the needy and unemployed.

PRINTING SENATE COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate concurrent resolution on the Speaker's desk which the Senate has sent over, authorizing the printing of certain hearings for the Senate, which I was asked to get up promptly. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this Senate resolution may be taken up and concurred in, as a matter of courtesy to the Senate.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 12

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 2,000 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee during the current session on sale of foreign bonds or securities in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8397) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8397, with Mr. O'CONNOR in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose there was pending a motion which I had made to strike out the last word to get some information as to the expenditures in the paragraph that had just been read, and I yielded to the gentleman from Colorado to make a motion to rise. I now ask recognition on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report shows that there is a reduction in one item under the budgetary estimate of $41,000, but an increase in another item of $18,000 over the appropriation of last year, although this last increase is what the Budget recommends. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], who, I believe, has special acquaintance with this subject, inform the committee as to the reason for the cut in one instance and the increase of the appropriation in the other?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will say in reply to the inquiry that we cut the estimate $41,000 below the Budget, because we felt that would be sufficient. We did this in the interest of economy. In the other instance the appropriation is from tribal funds, and we allowed the estimate of the Budget.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that in one instance you allowed the estimate of the Budget, which was $18,000, however, above the appropriation of last year.

Mr. HASTINGS. The other is a gratuity appropriation, and we cut that $41,000 in the interest of economy, believing that the $100,000, properly utilized, would be sufficient for this purpose during the coming year, in view of the fact that expenditures for this purpose have been made from year to year. The committee felt, upon careful consideration, that the $100,000 would be sufficient for this purpose, and we therefore reduced the estimate by the sum of $41,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is merely a deferment of some activity to another time when the Treasury can better afford the expenditure.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is a proper explanation.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary miscellaneous expenses incident to the general administration of Indian irrigation projects, including pay of employees and their traveling and incidental expenses, $102,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 4, page 25, the words "Indian irrigation projects," a pro forma amendment, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to announce to the committee that this is the last consent I shall give; we must get through with this bill. To-morrow is taken up, as well as the rest of this week. I propose to run until 5.30 this afternoon and see if we can finish the consideration of this bill. If we accede to requests to talk on various extraneous matters, we can not do this. So I feel that we must object to any further requests for general debate. This bill has been before the House for about two weeks, and I hope it will meet with the consent of Members on both sides of the House to decline further unanimous-consent requests with respect to the discussion of any matters outside of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman does not ask unanimous consent to speak out of order, but to speak for five additional minutes with reference to the bill.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, the Members will recall that some of us have been taking an unusual interest in irrigation projects in general during the last few sessions of the Congress. We have felt that additions to our farming areas in these times of surplus production is not sound public policy.

In the few minutes at my command this morning I want to present some suggestions along the same line in connection with the Indian irrigation projects.

The hearings before the subcommittee, on pages 309 to 425, deal with the whole subject of Indian irrigation projects very fully indeed, and I would especially urge you to read these hearings if you are interested. Every member of the subcommittee is to be commended for the special interest taken in this activity. Every one of them developed very valuable information.

Indian irrigation projects have been developed for many years. Real Government interest and encouragement began about 1890 and has continued increasingly since that time.

There are at present 45 irrigation projects on Indian reservations. These are divided into 168 units, of which 117 are practically complete. Twenty are in process of building, while 31 are still to be examined. In 1914 the reimbursable principle was established and applies except as to land irrigated by the Indians.

With this preliminary statement, I would like to have the attention of the committee while I present a few facts which I hope will challenge your interest on this proposition.

I hold in my hand a map which gives the picture in outline of the Indian irrigation districts of the United States. They were originally numbered from 1 to 5, but have now been combined into four districts—1 and 2 being combined into one. The red lines indicate the separations of the irrigation districts.

There are, as I have said, 45 irrigation projects on these Indian reservations, 168 units, of which 117 are practically complete, 20 in process of building, and 31 still to be examined.

Now, on 104 of these irrigated reservations Indian farmers are located to the number of 7,378 families. They irrigate 127,000 acres of the total of 735,000 acres under canal construction—or about 17 per cent. The average per family is 17 acres. One hundred and six thousand acres, or 14 per cent, are leased, and 188,000 acres, or 25 per cent, are owned by whites. Total utilized, 56 per cent. Thus 44 per cent of the acreage under canals is not utilized up to the present time.

To June 30, 1931, we have invested in these Indian irrigation projects $44,900,000 net, in surveys, construction, operation, and maintenance.

In construction costs, 16 out of the 117 units have reimbursed the Government $1,556,000 out of the total of $38,000,000, or 4 per cent.

Now, I would like to submit the problem to our mathematical experts. This single year's construction program calls for $1,424,000. If we have only collected $1,556,000 in the whole history of these projects, how many years will it take for the United States to catch up with the payments that are being made?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman compared the figures to show the percentage of collections on irrigation projects outside of Indian reservations?

Mr. KETCHAM. That will be a subject to be taken up at a later time. For the present, I want to confine myself to this.

In addition, bear in mind, to the net investment of $4,900,000 in these projects, to date we have $33,000,000 more estimated to complete the program, or a total when completed of nearly $78,000,000. When the total is expended we will have put into these projects $78,000,000. That is a little bit over $10,000 for every Indian family, and when it is remembered that only 1 acre out of 6 on these irrigation projects is now utilized for the Indians alone, and, furthermore, that when the program as outlined shall be completed that that ratio will increase from 1 to 10, unoccupied, it certainly seems that the time has come when the Congress ought to survey this whole situation and think it through very carefully. In that connection I particularly commend all that has been done by the committee, and I am very much pleased now to know that the Bureau of Indian Affairs has taken hold of this matter in a constructive way, and that a distinguished engineer has been placed in charge of this work. All that can be done, I think, has been done; but I think Congress has a responsibility in this connection.

During the progress of this debate it is my purpose to pick out one or two glaring examples of how we have overdone this matter of expanding Indian irrigation projects, and I shall have some definite suggestions to offer as we proceed; and those of you who are interested in economy, those of you who are interested in declaring that we ought not to embark on additional irrigation projects, either on Indian or other lands, until there is some favorable readjustment of our present production system, I ask to give me your earnest consideration.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I shall a little later on.

Mr. LEAVITT. I just wanted to ask the gentleman how many of these Indian irrigation projects he has ever seen?

Mr. KETCHAM. I have been through two or three of them in the gentleman's section.

Mr. LEAVITT. On the train?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes; but I have visited some of the others just casually. I have made no very extended observation of them, and am simply presenting the subject from the standpoint of figures, and I am sure they must challenge the thoughtful attention of my good friend who is vitally interested in this topic.

On the humanitarian side, to those of you for whom the Indian has a special appeal—and I count myself in that number—may I say that the bill under consideration carries over $20,000,000 for the Indians of the country in the various items under the bill, and so, being in favor of these items, and most of the items that are found in the irrigation projects, certainly no one can say that we are now assuming any attitude of hostility. I think the challenge is distinctly up to us in examining carefully these various projects to particularly scrutinize the items carrying new projects that are advanced for consideration, and there are one or two of them in the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] has attempted to apply cold mathematics to a question which includes human elements that can not be measured by any such mathematical rule. We must remember in connection with the Indian problem that the duty of this Government lies along one direction at least, and that is to train the Indians and develop the resources they have at their command so that they can ultimately become self-supporting citizens of the country. The gentleman states that he has gone through on the train two or three of the reclamation projects on Indian reservations, and has casually come in contact with perhaps some others. There is a situation the House must keep in mind in considering this entire question, and that is that there exist many of these reclamation projects on Indian reservations of the West loaded down with charges that never should have been applied against these lands, so far as any payment by the Indian is concerned.

When you put such charges against lands that belong to Indians who are not trained to use those irrigated lands, and then let those charges accumulate year after year, you make it impossible for those Indians to succeed. In addition to that, the Government has done another thing. Because of this mathematical consideration of this problem they stopped in the middle of the development of some of the projects on Indian reservations. While they have built dams and ditches, they have not built those works to a point where there is a supply of water adequate to enable the Indian successfully to irrigate the land. I can take you to many a place where Indian irrigation projects on Indian reservations are only partly under construction. They never were completed, never were capable of putting adequate water on the lands. Flumes have fallen down and gone into disrepair, and yet charges against that Indian tribe are included in the figures the gentleman from Michigan has presented to-day to this committee.

Now, instead of considering stopping projects on Indian reservations we should be considering the way to proceed to give the Indians the benefit of the irrigated lands necessary in connection with their grazing lands, to enable them to succeed in the agricultural and livestock businesses.

Let me give one or two illustrations. On the Fort Peck Indian Reservation in Montana there is a situation where they have a great area of first-class grazing land, but they are not able in dry years such as we have had recently to produce sufficient hay to supplement their grazing land, to enable them to go ahead in the production of livestock, upon which they depend. There is a partially completed reclamation project on their reservation. In Montana alone there are several such instances.

The time should be postponed when the Indians will have to pay back the heavy accumulation of charges. We should go ahead and complete projects by units, and the Indians should be trained to use such lands.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Is it not a fact that under the procedure of the Bureau of Indian Affairs no Indian on irrigated lands is pressed for collection, unless the land is leased? If he actually operates the irrigated land, is he pressed for collection of those charges?

Mr. LEAVITT. At the same time, those charges lie against that land. I have introduced a bill which I hope to have considered this session which will definitely postpone those payments.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. I ask for this additional time only because the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] has served notice that he intends to take up these items in the various places where they appear through this bill, item by item. I want the Members to understand some of these problems in advance, because if they are presented from a mathematical angle they look one way, and if they are presented from the needs of the Indian they look entirely otherwise.

Let me repeat that we are here considering a problem that has to do with the Indian population, a population that are wards of the Government of the United States. Let us recall that no Indian tribe that I know of ever asked in past years, at the beginning of construction of irrigation projects years ago, for the construction of those projects now charged against them. Many of these projects were built under the Reclamation Service before the Indian Service took over that work at all. Then in 1914 Congress passed an act that made those old costs reimbursable. You loaded these Indians down and then did not accept the responsibility of completing the projects so that the Indians could succeed; never accepted the responsibility of putting among those Indians trained men who could lead them to success in the handling of the irrigated lands; left out of the picture many of the essential things. Now, under the leadership of the Indian Bureau we are attempting to put into the field an organization that will make these Indians able to farm their lands and that will ultimately enable them to go forward and reach the objectives that are desired. We should see that they are not unjustly treated. It will require study and enlargement of many of these projects in order that this justice may be reached.

In the last Congress I introduced a bill which came to the floor, which called for a study and determination as to the old reimbursable charges. Many of them should be completely charged off. The Government should charge the expenditures to the education of the Indians or charge them to profit and loss. The Indian, with the slate wiped as clean as possible and put in as fair condition as possible, should be trained and encouraged to use the irrigated lands, and we should make it possible for him to do so.

Instead of attacking the Indian irrigation projects from the standpoint that they might bring some new land into cultivation, we ought to be considering this question from the standpoint of building a great portion of our population, the Indian race, who are wards of this Government, into the place that they ought to occupy in our citizenship, of self-supporting, self-respecting men and women under the American flag.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it not a fact that within the last 40 or 50 or 60 years, by agreements, treaties, and so forth, the areas which the Indians at one time had have been greatly reduced, and therefore a more intensive cultivation of the land is necessary?

Mr. LEAVITT. That is true.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would also like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that these appropriations must be made in order to preserve the water rights to the Indians, or else they will be forever lost to them?

Mr. LEAVITT. Of course, the Supreme Court has held that they can not lose their water rights through nonuse but that those rights will continue, largely, to exist. At the same time, the use of the water on that land is a necessity in the development of those people.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course; but if the water is appropriated and used for other purposes, the Indians will have an awfully hard time of ever getting any of it back.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is true. It would require court action and long delay.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Does the gentleman have at hand any figures that will show the proportion of irrigated lands that are being held by the Indians as against those held by other citizens?

Mr. LEAVITT. I have not that in acreage, but the amount under Indian ownership would be very small in comparison.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvements to the Fort Hall irrigation project, Idaho, including payment of damage claims and purchase of rights of way, as authorized by and in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1061), $332,500, reimbursable as provided in said act: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for expenditure until repayment contracts shall have been entered into in accordance with the provisions of said act.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Gentlemen of the committee, in the paragraph under consideration is the real object of the fight I want to make this afternoon, and so for about three or four minutes I would like to have your very careful attention. In a word, this item provides for launching into a new project of irrigation upon Indian lands.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I have but a few minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Merely in the interest of accuracy I wish to state that this project has been under construction for 25 years. It is not a new project in any sense of the word.

Mr. KETCHAM. Not this particular item. This is a new project in accordance with legislation passed in February of 1931 and is an addition to the Fort Hall Reservation. It provides for the bringing in of 30,000 acres of land and is a new legislative proposition.

Now, gentlemen, in a word—and I wish you would listen carefully, because in five minutes' time I can not go into a full argument of this matter—let me say that this item carries $332,500 as the initial appropriation in a program that will eventually call for the expenditure of $2,500,000. Of course, if I were convinced or thought that the Indians upon the Fort Hall Reservation were not now adequately cared for, if there were a real demand for this proposition, if an adequate study of the situation had been made so far as the wishes of the Indians involved in this situation are concerned, my attitude would be entirely different.

But now is the time—as we ought always to do in all of these irrigation projects—to consider it upon its real merits, because all of you know that when once a project has been initiated and the first appropriations have been made it is practically impossible to stop the proposition. So I am taking the time this afternoon to call your attention to this particular thing. I wish we all had the time to go over the hearings. If that were possible I would then leave it without debate to every thoughtful man in this room, with every kind of sympathy and full appreciation of our duty to the Indians, as to whether or not the project ought to be launched. But, men, in five minutes' time it is absolutely impossible to present the data.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. MAY. The position the gentleman takes is that the expenditure of additional funds on the extension of this project is not now justified?

Mr. KETCHAM. Not now justified. Now, gentlemen, in support of my contention may I say that upon the Fort Hall Reservation at the present time there is a total of 387 Indian families and there are already available for those 387 families 65,000 acres, and the Indians there, the whole 387 of them, are only irrigating 13,600 acres. Yet here is a proposition asking us to make an initial appropriation of $332,500 and an ultimate appropriation of $2,500,000, when the record itself shows that only 13,000 acres out of the present available 65,000 acres are to be used. If the problem were submitted to the Indians themselves it is a very grave question as to whether or not they would accept or be willing to enter into the preliminary contracts that are necessary in order to initiate this new project.

Therefore, men, I just want to lay this situation clearly before you, and only wish the chairman of the subcommittee had not imposed his limitation of time so we might have an opportunity to go into this thing and examine it fairly and squarely from the standpoint of the need of the Indians, and in view of the present economic situation, whether or not an expenditure of $300,000 as the initial one and an ultimate expenditure of $2,500,000 should be required in connection with this project.

If you do not believe this ought to be done, to-day is the day to act, because if this appropriation is passed that sets the project up; and, of course, you know what the appeal will be to go on and complete the work that has already been started. So, gentlemen, I have taken this little time this morning, not out of any spirit of unfriendliness to any person, but in order that we may lay this proposition once for all squarely before the House in order that it may determine what its policy shall be. So far as I am concerned, I think we ought to call a halt until at least the lands that are available for cultivation—65,000 acres with only 13,000 now actually irrigated by the Indians—are in use.

I submit to you that this is worthy of consideration in these days when we are talking so much about economy and when we are especially urged against initiating new projects.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Michigan advise the Chair whether he offered his amendment as a pro forma amendment?

Mr. KETCHAM. No, Mr. Chairman. This is a real amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KETCHAM: Page 27, line 16, strike out the paragraph from line 16 to line 24, inclusive.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM], usually very accurate in his statements, has succeeded this time in his address in building up a straw man which he has succeeded very effectually in knocking to pieces.

As a matter of fact, the area to which the gentleman refers does not include or carry one dollar of appropriation in the pending bill. The item carried in the pending bill provides for a continuation of work that has been under way for many years. It carries $332,500. In addition to the area to which this money refers, there is an area of 30,000 acres of land known as the Michaud Flats. This area we do not propose to reclaim at this time. This area represents land as to which there is some opposition on the part of the Indians, and the gentleman correctly stated a feature of certain Indian opposition, but he did not apply it to the proper acreage.

So far as the money in this bill is concerned, we are proposing to do two things only so far as construction may be concerned. First, we propose to improve the channel of a river, which instead of a canal is utilized for some 40 miles in carrying water from the irrigation reservoir to the land itself. In part, then, it proposes additional canals and water for lands already served with water, but inadequately served.

If the gentleman from Michigan will turn to the hearings on page 365——

Mr. KETCHAM. I may say I have read them many times with great care.

Mr. FRENCH. I can see the gentleman did not read this page, or if he did, he was not thinking of the question and the answer. The question that was asked by Mr. HASTINGS was this:

First, the project contemplates a development of a water system that will furnish an adequate water supply for Indian lands that are now partially served, and for which we do not have definite information as to the acreage and cost of the present water supply system, and the proposed cost upon the basis of additional water.

Turning to the next page the answer is by Mr. Post:

1. Present Fort Hall project: Total area, 60,000 acres, all under constructed ditches; construction cost $1,918,000; existing repayment contracts limit further construction expenditure chargeable to these 60,000 acres; sum necessary to compete, $332,500; present actually irrigated area, 30,000 acres.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. FRENCH. Not yet. The gentleman did not follow on to the next question. The next question was—

The proposition contemplates a possible ultimate water supply to an area of land known as the Michaud Flats, embracing some 30,000 acres of land.

The answer on the next page was:

The cost of carrying water to the 30,000 acres at Michaud Flats is estimated at $2,100,000.

We are not appropriating money for the Michaud Flats in this bill. We are appropriating money for the purpose to which I have referred. We have gone over this question carefully. The gentleman, usually so accurate in his statements and his studies of problems, is simply wrong upon this proposition. The bogey man he has built up is the Michaud Flats area for which we are not appropriating money. The gentleman is simply confusing the situation.

Mr. KETCHAM. The gentleman out of his own mouth destroys his own case, because if the gentleman will read this paragraph alone it says, "In accordance with the provisions of the act of February 4, 1931," and if the gentleman will read that act he will find that that has in contemplation this very project, and goes into it with great care and with great particularity as to all the things that will be accomplished, and surely the gentleman, who is always preeminently fair, would not go so far as to say that if this project is passed this afternoon and we start on this project, eventually two and a half million dollars will not be spent on this work. The gentleman is altogether too fair to make such a statement. That is the very purpose of it, and that is the very reason the bill making the authorization was passed last year, and if the gentleman will get the debate and read the plea made by my distinguished colleague from Idaho on the matter that will indicate the reason for it. I tell you, men, we ought to examine this carefully, much more carefully than we can to-day under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I want simply to remind the committee of this fact. The bill to which the gentleman referred provided for carrying on this general program, including the Michaud Flats.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one more minute to complete the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. But the committee has not approved of the Michaud Flats idea, and it has not brought in one dollar to apply to the Michaud Flats area.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. MAY. What amount of the irrigated territory, in proportion to the population of Indians, is already available for cultivation without the extension of this project?

Mr. KETCHAM. Sixty-five thousand acres is now available.

Mr. FRENCH. Something like 60,000 acres.

Mr. MAY. How many Indians occupy this territory?

Mr. KETCHAM. Three hundred and eighty-seven families.

Mr. FRENCH. A population of about 2,000. A word further with regard to the item in the bill. We seek to provide a means for adequate water supply to acreage that theoretically is receiving water but does not have enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KETCHAM) there were 33 ayes and 45 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operation and maintenance of the irrigation systems on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., $12,000; for continuation of construction Camas A betterment, $2,000; completing construction of Lower Crow Reservoir, $135,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriations for continuing construction of the Flathead irrigation system contained in the Interior Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1932; continuing Pablo Reservoir enlargement, $85,000; lateral systems betterment, $20,000; miscellaneous engineering, surveys, and examinations, $5,000; for continuing the construction of a power distributing system, $55,000; enlargement of Tabor feed canal, $22,000; beginning construction of pumping plant, $100,000; in all, $436,000: Provided, That the funds made available herein for continuation of construction shall be subject to the reimbursable and other conditions and provisions of said acts: Provided further, That upon execution by the Jocko district of repayment contract in pursuance to existing law, the operation and maintenance charges for such district for the irrigation season of 1932 shall be covered into construction costs.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Now, continuing the discussion of a moment ago, I want to call your attention to the paragraph in which my good friends from Montana are very much interested. I am not attempting to make any change in this particular item, but I want to call attention to some facts in the hope that when all Members shall read the RECORD, if they do, and see this particular item set out, they may be challenged to study the question, and proper action may be taken, at least in the next bill.

I call particular attention to this exceptional item. In the first place there are upon that Flathead Reservation 41 Indian families actually irrigating the land. Get that idea in your mind—41 Indian families on this reservation.

These 41 families irrigate 1,392 acres. The total available acreage is 112,500.

We have expended on that proposition $6,436,000, and the estimate is for $2,619,000 to complete.

Of course, it is idle to say that you ought to stop development on this particular proposition. It is begun, and nothing I could say could persuade Congress that it ought to be stopped, and there are, perhaps, good arguments on that side.

But I am calling attention to this as an illustration so that some adequate picture may be placed in your mind as a guide for future action.

Now, so far as the repayment is concerned, out of $6,000,000 there was repaid something like $90,000. I do not understand that a cent of this has come from the Indians. There have been repayments for operation and maintenance of $538,000.

Upon the basis of $90,000 repayment, and with the total expenditure running very close to $10,000,000, I again challenge the mathematicians of the House to figure out about how long it will be, if ever, before we are going to get any return for the money invested. Grant, as the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] suggests, that we ought to write off the charges written against the Indians in the olden days, even so, I have taken a minute of time to call attention to the extreme situation in this particular project in which our Montana friends are so vitally interested, and of which they are justly proud, not because of extreme enmity toward them or the Indians, but simply on the proposition that in view of these expenditures of money to-day we ought to be careful about launching new projects and survey them carefully and be sure that they meet an adequate public need before the money is expended in launching the projects. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman does not make any contention touching the item. The members of the committee have most earnestly and carefully gone over the items submitted, with the thought of eliminating expenses wherever possible. In this particular case, to which the gentleman has referred, we include $100,000, not because the members of the committee wanted to do it, but because a project is already under way that we can not control in this bill, and unless we make an appropriation of $100,000 for the beginning of a power plant, laying the foundations for it, ultimately when the area will be flooded it will cost the department vastly more than the amount we have included now. The proposed site will be flooded on account of construction work already on the way and which we can not stop economically. I realize that is why the gentleman is not contesting the point. He knows that we are up against a proposition that can not be met initially.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. The gentleman has made a fine speech in support of the very contention I have been making—that is, that when we get a thing started there is no stopping it. I agree with the gentleman, and the committee has done exceptionally well with the situation which has been committed to their hands, but what I am undertaking to do is to call the attention of the Members to the fact that we ought not to launch another Flathead proposition until we are sure we can see the end from the beginning. We can not save $6,000,000 now, because it is under way; but the gentleman has made a fine, eloquent speech and he has made the very best argument in support of the contention which I have been advancing. I certainly thank the gentleman for supporting my viewpoint.

Mr. FRENCH. The credit goes both ways. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveys and investigations for the construction of a dam or dams across the Owyhee River, or other streams within, or adjacent to, the Duck Valley Indian Reservation, Idaho and Nevada, as authorized by and in accordance with the act of February 28, 1931 (46 Stat., p. 1458), $15,000.

Mr. KETCHAM offered the following amendment:

Page 30, line 18, after the word "investigations," strike out the word "for" and insert in lieu thereof "of the feasibility of."

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, this is a project similar to the area upon which the committee just voted. I am not moving to strike out this provision, although it is the beginning that eventually may lead to an appropriation, but I have read the hearings very carefully two or three times on this proposition, and as far as I am concerned I would like to have the investigation made, but I would not like to have it written into this particular appropriation that these surveys and investigations are for the construction of a dam or dams across the Owyhee River or other streams. I would like to have the investigation made as to the feasibility of the proposition.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Did the gentleman read the hearings closely?

Mr. KETCHAM. I did.

Mr. MURPHY. Did the gentleman notice that this is the place which the former chairman of this subcommittee visited as the special representative of the Interior Department?

Mr. KETCHAM. I did, and I have read his very fine report. It was complete and convincing.

Mr. MURPHY. He made a splendid report. I am sure the gentleman caught the spirit of that report; that it was an effort to get some real, dependable data on which the committee and Congress and the Department of the Interior could rely. There is a limited water supply in that country and the watershed is limited. There is a demand for water farther down this river, and the Indians who live at this place which the gentleman is speaking of are asking that something be done to settle the rights that they enjoy, and they should have them, because the Government placed them up there. If after the investigation is had they find that they can not supply enough water from the watershed to take care of the rights of the Indians at this point and also to take care of the rights of the people who will come under the Owyhee irrigation project, then we will have something definite and certain to go on. I do hope that the gentleman will not oppose this item any further. I think it is very necessary.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am not opposing the item.

Mr. MURPHY. I want the gentleman to understand what it is to do.

Mr. KETCHAM. Oh, I understand it, and I am in favor of the investigation being made, but I want to avoid a definite commitment on the construction of a dam until the investigation is made. I am for the investigation. More than that, I assure the gentleman that my amendment is almost in the identical language proposed to the committee by Secretary Wilbur.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. This does not commit the Government definitely, but, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] says, this is for surveys and investigations, and it is in order to protect the rights of the Indians. I will be glad if the gentleman will read what Chief Engineer Walters said about the water rights of the Indians. The committee went into this very thoroughly and we carefully weighed this language, and we carefully considered this particular amendment which the gentleman is now offering, and the committee thought it inadvisable to put that language in the bill. The committee thought that in order to preserve the rights of the Indians this survey and investigation should be made. That is as far as this commits the Government.

Mr. KETCHAM. Now, if the gentleman representing the majority, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], and the gentleman representing the minority, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY], will say that it is their understanding of the proposition that the adoption of this item does not commit in any way the House of Representatives, to a construction program which may run into millions of dollars, I have absolutely no objection to the item.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will state unquestionably that that is true, unless there is some further legislation upon it or an appropriation made for it.

Mr. KETCHAM. Does the gentleman from Ohio also say that that is his understanding?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Is it the understanding of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] that the statement made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] is that this will not commit nor bind the Congress of the United States in any way to the construction of a dam, but simply provides for the necessary investigation in the matter and that we are not committed to the dam by it in any way?

Mr. MURPHY. That is my understanding, I will say to the gentleman, and I would like to have the gentleman ask for a couple of additional minutes so that I may tell him something more about the dam and the necessity for making the investigation.

Mr. KETCHAM. I may say I have read it many times with a great degree of interest.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the statements made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARENTZ: On page 30, line 23, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "to be made immediately available."

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, there is no particular need of going into details regarding this amendment except to say that the investigation is now under way and about completed; that the $15,000 which has been appropriated is to cover the cost of this investigation and it will be necessary to make it immediately available so that the work can be completed. The hearings will testify as to the truth of what I am saying.

I refer you particularly to the following, an extract from the hearings on this bill on page 413 of the committee hearings; these remarks were made by Mr. Louis Cramton, who is making a special report on this project:

I find that those Indians are now and for many years have been making the fullest possible use of water of the Owyhee for irrigation, and they have for many years been asking construction of storage to enable them to secure more beneficial use of these waters. Inasmuch as they now have no water for irrigation purposes later than early June, their efforts to provide hay for winter feed of their range stock is seriously handicapped. While there may be difference of opinion as to the amount of water which it is feasible or proper to store for their use, I find no one in the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Bureau of Reclamation, or those interested in the Owyhee project who does not admit that these Indians are entitled to some storage, if there is a feasible dam site.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to the gentleman's amendment. It seems to be appropriate and, therefore, I do not oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reimbursement to the reclamation fund the proportionate expense of operation and maintenance of the reservoirs for furnishing stored water to the lands in Yakima Indian Reservation, Wash., in accordance with the provisions of section 22 of the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. 604), $11,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to reserve the right to return to this item on page 33 later on during the consideration of this bill for the purpose of considering an item that was recommended by the Budget but which the committee did not insert in the bill. I want to reserve the right, if we so desire, to offer an amendment later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to reserve the right to return to this paragraph later on, if the committee sees fit to do so. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Now, gentlemen, in connection with this item and one other item, I am going to repeat in general terms what I have said on two or three other occasions this afternoon and then that will conclude what I have to say on these irrigation projects, the whole purpose being to make available in the record a sort of statement as to the general plan and scope of them and the necessity of examining carefully any future projects of this sort before they are launched. With that idea in mind I call your attention particularly to the item for which future consideration has just been asked. On that reservation there are 169 Indian families; there are 200,000 acres in the project, and 11,659 acres are farmed by the Indians; 151,000 acres are under canals, and, mind you, less than 12,000 acres are actually cultivated by the Indians. In addition, 95,000 acres are leased by the whites. The cost of this project when it shall be completed runs to the tidy sum of $11,348,000. I think, having said that much, I ought to turn around to the other side of it and say that of all the projects on Indian reservations this is the most hopeful and this is the best one from the economic viewpoint, because this one project has returned over 75 per cent of all the repayments that have ever been made in all the history of Indian irrigation projects upon original construction. So that tribute ought to be paid to this particular reservation. But I again want to nail this point down: What is the necessity of expanding further this kind of work so long as only 11,000 acres out of a total available of 151,000 acres—a ratio of about 1 to 15 of acres occupied to acres available—are now being farmed by Indians?

So I would like to have you read the report, study it carefully, and, if you please, at some future time, when it shall be proposed to launch some of these other projects, that we have some facts upon which to base our judgment as to whether or not we ought to vote favorably upon a proposition of that kind.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. What is the gentleman's opinion as to these appropriations contributing further to agricultural surpluses?

Mr. KETCHAM. I may say to the gentleman from Iowa that earlier in the afternoon I referred to that incidentally, but, of course, these Indian projects are relatively small. However, I will say to the gentleman that during the course of my remarks I referred to a contemplated addition of 30,000 acres on one of the Idaho projects which would produce Idaho potatoes that find their way to the House restaurant and take the place of the potatoes which come from Michigan. Of course, they are not to be compared with Michigan potatoes, but that simply shows that here are 30,000 acres of land that may be used for the purpose of raising potatoes which will displace Michigan potatoes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho rose.

Mr. KETCHAM. I know what the gentleman from Idaho is going to say about his Idaho potatoes, but the gentleman has never eaten Michigan potatoes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is certainly unfortunate that the gentleman does not state facts instead of dealing in fancy.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I will address the interrogation to the gentleman from Idaho which I have propounded as to whether these appropriations bring in further lands that will contribute further to the production of agricultural sulpluses. I see the gentleman differs from the gentleman who just had the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I would say absolutely not, because these are Indian lands and the Indians must be put in a position where they can produce their own foodstuffs. There are very few commodities of any kind that are raised on Indian reservations that are not consumed either by the Indians themselves or by the people living close by.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, may I, from the committee, say just a few words in answer to the gentleman? It has been the very constant policy of our committee to avoid including new money to bring in new lands. Where we have included some money that will have the effect of making available more land it is because we are tied into a proposition that is already a going concern and we can not turn back without very serious economic loss; or, in one or two instances, where we are carrying money for supplemental water to lands that are already inadequately reclaimed.

I think all members of the subcommittee will agree that these are the principles that we have recognized, and we have turned our faces against bringing in new acreage and new lands.

Let me say further with regard to Indian lands, the policy that has been adopted, and has been followed for some years, of reclaiming lands where the Indians themselves were not primarily interested in farming individually is a policy that has had regard for the long-time welfare of the Indians. Indians have been located upon lands by Congresses long before our time. These lands are in areas that are drawing water from one great watershed where there are other lands owned by white people. If the Members of this Congress and the Congresses of preceding years were to be content with saying that Indians, because they are not interested in going out and raising fruit and potatoes and agricultural products generally, through irrigation, shall not be entitled to have the Government, which is the guardian, you might say, of these Indians, husband their property, reclaim their lands, we will not be doing our duty to them, because in a comparatively few years, or in another generation, at least, practically all the water will be diverted upon lands owned by the white people. What, then, will be the answer of the Congress of the United States to Indian children born now who will say, "You, the Government, the guardian of the affairs of the Indians, were blind to the very interests that ought to have addressed themselves most seriously to you, in not providing some system of irrigation when water was available for lands that you arbitrarily gave to our forefathers"?

This has been the thought that has been in the mind of the members of our committee—trying to do the right thing by the Indian and trying, on the other hand, not to do the unjust thing toward agriculture in these trying times.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations herein for irrigation and drainage of Indian lands shall be available only for expenditure by and under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, except for such engineering and economic studies and construction work as the Secretary of the Interior decides may be more advantageously performed by the Bureau of Reclamation.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call attention to the last one of these projects. This is what is known as the Wind River Reservation. I present the facts as they appear in the hearings concerning that project. There are upon the Wind River Indian Reservation 201 Indian families. There are in the project 78,600 acres, of which 5,740 are under canal and 10,263 acres actually farmed by the Indians, or practically 1 acre out of every 5½ available is actually tilled by the Indians.

There are 2,398 acres leased by Indians. I do not have the record of white ownership. In fact, in a large number of projects the white ownership is in excess of the Indian ownership.

In this particular project we have already expended $2,294,000, and we are obliged to spend $1,097,000 more, making a total expenditure for the welfare of these Indians of $3,386,000.

I want to place these facts in the RECORD this afternoon so that Members of the House, as they are thinking of this one proposition, may have the basis of facts produced from the hearings themselves upon which they might consider their conclusions. Of course, you might say that we could get it from the hearings, but, in my experience, you do not go into the hearings very fully unless you are interested.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. The gentleman has referred to the large quantity of land available. I would like to inquire if that can be cultivated without irrigation or does it require irrigation?

Mr. KETCHAM. In every instance I have mentioned the acreage is now under canals and could be irrigated.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I want to say that the gentleman is attempting to make a comparison here which is unjust against the irrigation projects. The Indians are allotted as much as 160 acres; and if they cultivate 10 per cent, they may be exhausting their financial ability to cultivate more. It may be impossible for them to cultivate 60, 80, or 100 acres, as they may have to start in slowly on account of their poverty. The comparison made by the gentleman from Michigan is misleading.

Mr. KETCHAM. May I say in response that at the beginning I made my position clear. I said that I had no prejudice against the Indians. I said that the committee had given careful consideration and study to the question.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Does the gentleman wish to reflect upon the industry, ability, and intelligence of men who represent the districts where these projects are located and the members of the committee who have frequently visited the Indian reservations and have studied these projects?

Mr. KETCHAM. I tried to make my position clear. I praised the thoroughgoing work of the committee and the splendid work of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the work of the able engineer who has been at the head of it. But I am sure the gentleman can not controvert the assertion that there has been waste. When once started these projects, like Tennyson's brook, "go on forever."

While the gentleman is on his feet pleading so eloquently for the Indians may I make this little observation, that I think possibly there is a little plea for the whites who have gotten in on the Indian lands as well. That is all commendable, coming from the gentleman's viewpoint; but from the standpoint of the country at large, all I have sought to accomplish is to bring within your purview some of the facts and ask you to give them further consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I tried to secure information privately from one of the members of the subcommittee as to the arrangement that the Bureau of Indian Affairs makes with the white settlers for the utilization of these irrigated projects, but I was unable to secure the information.

Has any member of the committee any information as to what terms are exacted from the white settlers for the utilization of these Indian irrigated lands?

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] can answer much better than I, but there is a system of leases which are made for a certain length of time, under certain rules and regulations of the department, and those leases must be approved by the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any uniform lease, or do the terms of the leases vary? What privileges has the white man to go on these irrigated projects and avail himself of these lands that are awaiting settlement?

Mr. FRENCH. May I answer the gentleman?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] has called the attention of the committee to a large amount of acreage that is undeveloped. I would like to know, and I think other members of the committee would likewise wish to be informed, as to the terms that are exacted for white settlers going on this large acreage of Indian lands.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman's question calls for a two-fold answer. In the first place, it refers to lands that are interspersed among or adjacent to Indian lands but that are owned by whites. As to those lands, the white settlers pay their full share of construction costs and operation and maintenance, and as to them there is no plan by which their payments may be deferred. If there should be any delinquencies whatever, it would be a matter for the Government itself to take notice of and enforce payment. Payments, however, on lands in white ownership are kept up very generally as to the amounts that are due. On June 30, 1931, out of $14,993,572 expended on account of white lands, $1,188,666 had fallen due, and of this amount only $141,060 remained unpaid.

Now, with regard to the other part of the gentleman's question, many of the Indians are not able to farm the lands that are owned by them, and the Government, through the Indian Office, arranges for lessees to take over the land. Of course, each particular tract is a problem by itself. The individual lessee makes a lease contract with the Government for the rental of the land, and the lessee pays rental and keeps up the operation and maintenance charges of the land. I should say, however, that as regards the cost of construction, that item does not fall due so long as the land is owned in trust for the Indians. It attaches to the land, in the sense that it is an obligation upon the land. If the land shall be sold, then the Government at once looks to the purchaser for the collection of the moneys that have attached to the land for the cost of reclamation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the position of the gentleman, it is that these white settlers are more or less squatters, under temporary tenure; they are not permanent settlers on these Indian irrigated lands?

Mr. FRENCH. They are not squatters in the sense that they ever hope to acquire the land. They are renters who go upon the land because the land is inviting and the Indians are not capable of farming the lands themselves.

Mr. STAFFORD. In most instances do those white settlers have other lands which they cultivate?

Mr. FRENCH. Usually not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then they are a rather shiftless sort of people, who migrate from time to time? They only have a temporary lease?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, no, no. The leases are for several years, as a rule; sometimes as long as 10 years, and the lessees are responsible people.

Mr. STAFFORD. But those white settlers can not look forward to ever having a permanent home on these tracts of land?

Mr. FRENCH. No; not unless those lands should be acquired in one of two ways—either through the Indian receiving patent in fee to the land and selling it or through the Indian owner dying and the white man, through the probate court, acquiring the land.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the usual size of these lands cultivated by the whites?

Mr. FRENCH. It depends on the type of agriculture. In a country where a great amount of grain or alfalfa is raised, the acreage would run 40, 80, and 160 acres; in some instances possibly more; in fruit areas less.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do they erect any homes on those lands?

Mr. FRENCH. Sometimes they do and sometimes they do not. They ought to live, and usually do live, near the land. With irrigated land they must live very near the land or upon the land. I have driven through reservations time and again and I have seen homes. Of course, the homes are not the type of homes that a man would build if he were building upon his own land.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. May I say it is the policy of the Indian Office and it is the policy of the committee to insist to the extent possible that the Indians themselves do their own farming. In other words, we do not want to encourage tenancy. We do not want to encourage the Indians in a policy of leasing out their lands, receiving their rentals, and existing merely upon their rentals.

Mr. STAFFORD. But how successful has the Government been in trying to induce the Indians to work when they do not wish to work?

Mr. FRENCH. You point out a very difficult problem, and it depends upon the section of the country under consideration. In the southwestern part of the United States the Indians naturally take to agriculture under irrigation. I have seen canals that Indians built before America was discovered. It is an easy proposition to encourage the Indians there to engage in agriculture upon reclaimed lands. In the Northwest, however, it is not such an easy proposition. It is a proposition, in fact, new to the whites, and it is a proposition that does not appeal to the average Indian, and the proportion is comparatively small, but even there it depends upon the individual group with regard to the tendency of the Indians to take part and farm the lands themselves. The policy of the department is in every possible way to encourage the Indians to do just that thing.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

EDUCATION

For the support of Indian schools not otherwise provided for, and other educational and industrial purposes in connection therewith, including tuition for Indian pupils attending public schools, $3,521,500: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 of this appropriation may be used for the support and education of deaf and dumb or blind, physically handicapped, or mentally deficient Indian children: Provided further, That $4,500 of this appropriation may be used for the education and civilization of the Alabama and Coushatta Indians in Texas: Provided further, That not more than $10,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be expended for the tuition of Indian pupils attending higher educational institutions, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, but formal contracts shall not be required, for compliance with section 3744 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 16), for payment of tuition of Indian pupils attending public schools, higher educational institutions, or schools for the deaf and dumb, blind, physically handicapped, or mentally deficient: And provided further, That not to exceed $10,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available for educating Indian youth in stock raising at the United States Range Livestock Experiment Station at Miles City, Mont.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. I have received a number of letters and telegrams that indicate a considerable shortage this year in the amount of money available to pay tuition for Indian children in the public schools.

One of the telegrams will perhaps interest the committee, and I will read it. It is from Lodge Grass, Mont., which is on the Crow Indian Reservation:

Notified hot lunches Crow children discontinued. Indian home conditions poorer this year. Unusual amount snow and winter weather now. Children coming to school on bus have 9-hour day. Discontinuing hot lunches will lower attendance. Decrease teaching results deprive child. Hot nourishing meal needed. Solicit help for appropriations.

I presented that to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and action was taken that will continue the giving of those lunches in that particular place, but it outlines a situation that is not unusual, as these matters have come to my attention. The shortening down of the appropriations for Indian children in public schools is resulting, and is sure to result, in decreasing the number that can go to school. The development of the idea among the Indians that their children should go to the public schools, in my judgment, deserves a great deal of encouragement. There is, as I understand it, no real decrease in this bill in that particular item, but there is in it no provision for an increase to meet the added costs that are sure to be required during the next school year. Is there any information that can be given as to what is expected in that regard?

Mr. HASTINGS. We did not have any additional information. As the gentleman from Montana knows, this amount is the amount that was estimated by the Bureau of the Budget, and the committee did not decrease it. Of course, if during the year it is found that an additional amount may be necessary, the Indian Bureau can apply to the proper officials, have an estimate made for them, and then it can be cared for in a deficiency bill. But the committee allowed the entire amount that was estimated by the Bureau of the Budget for this purpose.

Mr. LEAVITT. My information is that there was a shortage of $58,000 or $60,000 this year, making it impossible to put in some of the schools Indian children for whom applications were made. I am very glad to hear that the policy of the committee is sympathetic with the idea that there will be an increase in this amount in a deficiency appropriation if the Indian Office makes the proper showing.

Mr. HASTINGS. And it is found to be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. This is the item which provoked considerable discussion when the appropriation bill for last year was under consideration, especially anent that provision which seemed to be a new policy, namely, that of encouraging Indians to attend the higher public schools. It is generally conceded that it is a policy that should be encouraged, and yet I find here this restriction, that not more than $10,000 of this $3,521,000 may be availed of for that purpose.

Mr. LEAVITT. I think the gentleman is referring to the $10,000 limitation for educating Indian youth in stock raising at the United States Range Livestock Experiment Station at Miles City, Mont. However, that is an item which will, as the years go by, necessarily have to be increased, but I was referring particularly to the payment of tuition of Indian children in the public schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stand corrected. The gentleman has pointed out my error. However, I ask how much has been estimated, out of this $3,500,000, for the payment of the tuition of Indian children in higher education. It is an innovation in the policy of the administration of the affairs of the Indian Bureau, but one which I believe should be encouraged. However, I take issue with the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] when he attempts to shift the question by saying they can come to Congress next year for a deficiency. Every department of the Government, including the Bureau of Indian Affairs, has been served with notice that they shall keep within the Budget estimates, and the subcommittee handling the Interior Department appropriation bill has agreed to the Budget estimate. When a committee of the Congress has agreed to the Budget estimate what excuse would there be for a department to exceed the Budget estimate?

Mr. HASTINGS. When this item was reached, we did not have any estimate for any higher amount; the Indian Bureau did not ask the committee for any more, and it did not ask for an enlarged appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I agree.

Mr. HASTINGS. There was no request made to the committee for an increased appropriation. Now, suppose the gentleman himself had been sitting on this subcommittee and had been a member of it, would he have thought it proper to have voluntarily increased the amount over the amount contained in the estimate?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at all, and I compliment the gentleman, but I criticize his statement that if it is found necessary that more funds shall be given that they shall come in and ask for a deficiency, because the gentleman knows that every department of the Government has been told to keep within the Budget estimate, and there would be no excuse for any of the departments exceeding those estimates.

Mr. HASTINGS. As a member of this committee and as a Member of Congress, if I find that any item in this or in any other appropriation bill is inadequate to meet the legitimate needs and a proper showing can be made and there is a Budget estimate for it, so far as I am concerned, either as a member of this committee, a member of any other committee, or as a Member of this House, I will sympathetically consider it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to ascertain how much of this appropriation is being estimated for this commendable work of allowing Indian youth to be educated in our higher schools?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is $10,000. The item of $10,000 to which the gentleman refers, for educating Indian youth in stock raising at the United States Range Livestock Experiment Station at Miles City, Mont., is a separate item.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I was correct in my original statement and I withdraw the acknowledgment that I was in error.

Mr. FRENCH. If the gentleman will turn to page 429 of the hearings——

Mr. LEAVITT. Does the gentleman mean that there is only $10,000 for the payment of tuition of Indian children in public schools?

Mr. FRENCH. No; for higher education. I have the itemization here. Upon page 429 of the hearings it appears we have allowed the entire estimate of $10,000 for education in higher institutions. We have allowed, in addition to that, $10,000 for the Miles City experiment station, where training is going on. We have allowed for day schools and general, $516,000; for boarding schools, $2,340,000; for day-school tuition, $470,000; for tuition, incapacitated Indians, $15,000. This is the general program we are providing for in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. My criticism against the recommendation of the committee is that the committee has been too parsimonious altogether in allotting the amount for education of our Indian youth in our higher schools. Ten thousand dollars is nothing compared with the needs of the occasion. Why not increase that amount and cut down the appropriation in some other particular? Ten thousand dollars for high-school education for all the Indian youth in the United States is ridiculously low.

Mr. FRENCH. This is the first time this item of $10,000 has been carried in the bill. Not much money has been used from the general fund heretofore. We are beginning, you might say, to expand education among Indians along this line, and the $10,000 is the amount recommended by the Budget for this particular purpose.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, if the gentleman will permit, he does not understand the expenditure of this appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thank the gentleman for that compliment.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman does not understand the language.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I entered into the discussion of this matter last year.

Mr. HASTINGS. Wait a minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. In my time I will be glad to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will get the gentleman a minute more.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will take more time than that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit, all of the money that is appropriated for tuition purposes in public schools is allocated to that purpose. The Indian children may go to lower-grade public schools or the high schools. This particular $10,000 is for the purpose of giving them a still higher education above the high school, and I say again the gentleman is mistaken in the construction that should be placed upon this language, because every Indian pupil that attends a public school, if there is a high school available, can attend it. This $10,000 is to enable Indian pupils to go still higher in securing an education.

Mr. STAFFORD. When this question was under discussion a year ago, I recall very distinctly that my colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHNEIDER] participated in the debate, and I was rather surprised to find that as far as Wisconsin was concerned the condition on the Menominee Indian Reservation was that there was very little money being used for the education of the Indian youth in our public high schools.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. As the gentleman will recall, there was a provision in that bill for lending money to Indian pupils to go to the University of Wisconsin, and that has been taken advantage of. I do not know whether it is in this bill or not. I presume it is. However, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact, if he will yield just at this time——

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I am always pleased to yield to my colleague from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the amount for tuition for Indian children in the public schools is inadequate. There are more Indian children going from the boarding schools to the public schools each year. There is a desire on the part of the Indian child to go to the public school, but the Congress and the Bureau of Indian Affairs have not provided the means to give the Indian a white man's education. They seem to cling, and so does the Congress, to the old system of boarding schools or the Indian education that has brought the Indian nowhere. The boarding schools have proven an absolute failure.

Mr. STAFFORD. I welcome the statement of the gentleman, and my own position is confirmed by one who knows the actual conditions.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I am just a bit puzzled at the colloquy that has just taken place on the $10,000 item that appears in this bill. If this Government could contribute $10,000 to help some poor boy whose skin is not red and is not called an Indian and help him to get started somewhere in one of the higher schools of learning, I think everyone here would be in favor of such an expenditure; but this $10,000 is to be used for the Indian that has ambition enough to want to go to school farther than we now have school facilities for him.

This is really a new experiment, this $10,000 to help the Indian who really wants higher education and is competent to receive the same.

I have been on this committee for a number of years, and I have listened to many pleas made on behalf of the poor Indians. We do mighty well for the Indian. We are spending also $100 per capita more this year for the Indian children in the schools of this country than we spent in 1925.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Can the gentleman tell me where that is spent?

Mr. MURPHY. In the boarding schools. This is a new policy being worked out in the Indian Bureau, of taking care of children in the public schools. You must understand, gentlemen of the committee, that there are many communities around the Indian reservation that do not welcome the Indian children in the public schools.

For reasons best known to these folks, these communities near the Indian reservation do not want them.

Through the policy now being worked out in the Indian Bureau, the children are being sent to the public school, and the bureau finds that it is one of the best moves that has yet been made to really bring civilization to the Indians.

This $10,000 item is intended to help any Indians who really want to be helped. I wish we had items of this kind to help the poor white boy who has an ambition to get somewhere. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Albuquerque, N. Mex.: For 850 pupils, $286,500; for pay of superintendent, drayage, and general repairs and improvements, $25,000; for repairs to heating system, replacement of two boilers, rehabilitation and extension of steam mains, $12,000; for deep well and equipment, $5,000; for hog and poultry houses, $3,000; in all, $331,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire generally, whether the attendance of these schools is diminishing or increasing and, if increasing, whether it is general or only in isolated cases? I may say that I visited this Albuquerque school some years ago when I was passing through the State on my way to the coast.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not have the figures as to this school at hand, but generally speaking, they are crowded. We do not have sufficient capacity for all pupils. I have one school in mind, where we appropriated for a capacity—the Haskell Institute at Lawrence, Kans.—we appropriated on a capacity basis of 900, and my recollection is that the attendance showed 1,012. In other words, there were in attendance 112 above the capacity. You will find in the hearings that we asked the question of each school as to the actual attendance. They are really crowded above capacity, sometimes 25, sometimes 50 or more over the capacity.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that that is due to the increase in population of the Indians as a whole.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is one reason, and the second is that the Indians are becoming more accustomed to attending boarding schools. It is much easier now to encourage them through their parents to have their children attend boarding schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform us whether there is a tendency on the part of the parents to have their children attend the public schools or the boarding schools?

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, I have very decided views about that. I hesitate to take up the time of the committee, but let me answer it in this way. It will take some little time to fully discuss it. It differs with every Indian tribe. In a good many tribes they do not have sufficient food at home, in some cases not sufficient clothing, in others no money to buy books, and under those circumstances it is difficult to induce the Indian children to attend the public schools.

Now, if a child is undernourished or does not have sufficient clothing or books, under those circumstances, let me say to the gentleman, it is next to impossible to get the Indian children to attend public schools. If they are compelled to attend public schools in preference to going to boarding schools, they are denied the privilege of an education.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because of the natural pride to be as well dressed as those who are attending public schools?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. If the gentleman will permit me, I thank the gentleman for his interest and for his constructive study of the Indian question; but I would have to answer the question of the gentleman by saying that in each case he would have taken into consideration local conditions in practically every Indian tribe. Conditions differ with the several Indian tribes.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Is it not true that the Bureau of Indian Affairs now is taking hundreds and thousands of Indian children out of their homes and transporting them hundreds and thousands of miles and putting them into boarding schools against the will of the parents?

Mr. HASTINGS. If it is against the will of the parents, I have never heard of it. It has never been brought to the attention of the committee nor to my attention. No investigation before our committee ever disclosed that state of affairs. Now, I say to the gentleman that I represent a district that at one time was all Indian. Oklahoma has one-third of the Indians of the United States, and there has never been a single complaint that the Bureau of Indian Affairs has, against the will of the parents or the guardian or those having the Indians in charge, forced them away from the public schools to go to boarding schools, but in all cases they preferred to go.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tomah, Wis.: For 350 pupils, $112,500; for pay of superintendent, drayage, and general repairs and improvements, $18,000; for repairs to central heating plant and extension of steam mains, $6,000; in all, $136,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Last year, in the consideration of this paragraph and the one preceding, some criticism was lodged against the committee for the attitude of the National Government in not providing proper hospitalization for the Indians located on the reservation at Tomah, Wis. Can the gentleman acquaint the committee as to whether that situation has been corrected in any way by the building of a hospital or the like? I believe there were some plans made for taking care of that situation by authorizing the building of a hospital at or near Tomah.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not certain, but my recollection is there was one built there last year. There is a hospital there now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe it was constructed under an appropriation authorized in last year's appropriation act, but my memory is somewhat at fault.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I invite the gentleman's attention to the item under the health items where we have appropriated $27,000 for the support of that hospital at Tomah? The gentleman will find that farther on in the bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Colorado: Ute Mountain Hospital, $12,000; Ignacio Hospital, $18,000; for physician's quarters, $7,000; in all, $25,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

During the general debate on the bill the chairman stated the consideration of the different items would be left for the 5-minute rule. I notice the budgetary officer reduced the appropriation of last year from $4,050,000 to $3,310,000, and the committee further reduced it about $100,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. Ninety-seven thousand.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ninety-seven thousand dollars over the budgetary officer's recommendation, or a total reduction of $837,000 for health purposes. Will some member of the committee make an explanation of that very obvious large reduction in the appropriation made last year?

Mr. HASTINGS. The large reduction which the gentleman refers to is in construction. There are no new hospitals provided for. Last year there were two large hospitals, one in New Mexico and one for the Sioux, which totaled $750,000, and perhaps others that I do not recall; but in any event, the reason for the reduction is that this new construction is not provided for.

Mr. STAFFORD. There has been no radical reduction for the operation of the hospitals.

Mr. HASTINGS. No. I will call attention to three items. We reduced it under the Budget $97,000. The hospital provided for down in New Mexico has not been constructed, and the Budget estimate was for $45,000 for maintenance. It will not be constructed in time to use that $45,000, so we save that amount.

The same is true with reference to the Sioux hospital. That is $90,000. Then there was a saving of $7,000 in physicians' quarters at one of these hospitals, and those three items amount to $97,000, which is the reduction below the bureau's estimate.

Mr. STAFFORD. The explanation made by my friend from Oklahoma shows that there is no radical or drastic cut in the appropriations for maintenance. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nonreservation boarding schools receiving specific appropriations shall contribute on a per diem basis for the hospitalization of pupils in hospitals located at such schools and supported from this appropriation.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the proviso in lines 19 to 22 be transposed to the proviso starting in line 23 and ending in line 5, page 50, by striking out the word "further" in line 23 and adding the word "further" after the proviso in line 19.

Mr. HASTINGS. And that the two provisos be transposed?

Mr. GOSS. That the two provisos be transposed; yes. The reason for doing this is that the 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts might be construed as applying to nonreservation boarding schools receiving specific appropriations and which contribute on a per diem basis for hospitalization and that they might withhold 90 per cent. If the consent I have asked is granted, I understand what I propose to do will be in line with what the department is doing and that the committee has no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut that the more proper way to do that would be to move to strike out the first proviso and then move to insert it after the second proviso.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I have prepared such an amendment, which I now offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 49, strike out lines 19 to 22.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts shall be available interchangeably for expenditures in the various hospitals named, but not more than 10 per cent shall be added to the amount appropriated for any one of said hospitals or for any particular item within any hosiptal, and any interchange of appropriations hereunder shall be reported to Congress in the Annual Budget.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 49, line 23, strike out the word "further," and after the word "Budget," in line 5, page 50, insert a colon and add the following: "Provided further, That nonreservation boarding schools receiving specific appropriations shall contribute on a per diem basis for the hospitalization of pupils in hospitals located at such schools and supported from this appropriation."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the real purpose to be accomplished by the transposition of the provisos?

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman will turn to line 23, page 49, he will notice that 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts shall be available interchangeably for expenditures in the various hospitals named. As I read that language the words "foregoing amounts" might refer to the specific appropriations and the per diem basis in the proviso just at the head of the one we are discussing. If the provisos are transposed, then that 10 per cent would not be applicable to the nonreservation boarding school appropriations available for hospitals, and it is my opinion that it is the intention of the committee to have only the 10 per cent of the amount for the hospitals apply to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

There shall be available for health work among the several tribes of Indians not exceeding $225,000 of the tribal trust funds authorized elsewhere in this act for support of Indians and administration of Indian property: Provided, That not more than $7,500 of such amount may be expended for new construction in connection with health activities at any one place.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the purpose of segregating $225,000 of the trust funds? Is it the general rule to utilize the trust funds of these Indian tribes for this purpose that have trust funds available?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it prorated according to the amount of the trust fund or is it just arbitrarily determined by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. HASTINGS. It is determined by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and it is only used where they have trust funds that are available for such purpose. Of course, if an Indian tribe does not have any trust funds at all it is taken out of the Federal Treasury altogether. For instance, among the Osages in Oklahoma or among any other of the tribes that have large trust funds to their credit this money is used for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. Right there, is it the policy of the Congress where an Indian tribe has ample trust funds to require that these funds shall be used exclusively for the care and conservation of the health of the Indians or do we also supplement the allotment of trust funds for health purposes by specific appropriations?

Mr. HASTINGS. I know of no case where it is not supplemented by additional appropriations from the Federal Treasury. There may be some exceptions, but I do not recall any.

Mr. MURPHY. I would call the gentleman's attention to the bill that was passed the other day appropriating $25 per capita for the Chippewa Tribe of Indians out of their trust fund in addition to what we are now appropriating.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's reply does not meet the interrogation point in my mind. For instance, in the case of the Osages, where they have a very large trust fund, I am trying to ascertain the policy of the Government as to supplementing the work of conservation of health by voting individual money.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me tell the gentleman about the Osages. In that case there is no money taken out of the Federal Treasury. The appropriation for the current year was $259,000 and the amount carried in this bill is $175,000, but it is taken altogether out of tribal funds, because they have sufficient tribal funds. So far as I know, this is the only exception, and this did not occur to me a moment ago. If the gentleman will look at the report, he will find that we take money out of tribal funds for various purposes, including health work, schools, and for the preservation of Indian property, amounting approximately to $2,400,000. We have been pursuing this policy for 25 years, and wherever trust funds reach the vanishing point then we make the appropriation directly out of the Federal Treasury. This is the distinction that is made. In all cases, so far as I know, without any discrimination, wherever there are sufficient trust funds we appropriate the money from the tribal funds, but whenever they are exhausted, of course, or reach the vanishing point then we make the appropriation out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has given informative facts which I wished to acquire, and I do not believe this question has ever been presented before to the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not think it has ever been discussed before.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Medical relief in Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, and under his direction through the Bureau of Indian Affairs, with the advice and cooperation of the Public Health Service, to provide for the medical and sanitary relief of the Eskimos, Aleuts, Indians, and other natives of Alaska; erection, purchase, repair, rental, and equipment of hospital buildings; books and surgical apparatus; pay and necessary traveling expenses of physicians, nurses, and other employees, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under the above special heads, $281,800, to be available immediately.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee if it is the policy of the Interior Department to include a building program along with the annual maintenance of a given activity? I direct the gentleman's attention to line 19, providing for the erection, purchase, and repair of buildings, and then subsequently there is provision for maintenance. Will this mean there can be a building program initiated under this bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit, of course, this could not permit of any large construction. It is almost entirely for rental and repair of what few scattered hospitals they have. This item carries only $281,800, and that covers the entire Territory of Alaska, which, as the gentleman knows, is about as big as the United States.

Mr. THURSTON. But I am particularly inquiring as to a policy which would permit the erection of buildings. The word "erection" is set off by itself in line 19 of this page, and I wondered if it is the policy to have a building program included and covered up in a supply bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, from my general acquaintance with the bill, I hardly think it is purposed to allow any amount for original construction out of this item. It has merely been carried along in prior years in this way and has no such purpose, I believe, at the present time.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have looked up the details or the breakdown of this item and I find there is no new construction provided for in the item.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes, Montana (article 7, treaty of May 10, 1868, and agreement of February 28, 1877), $75,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information. We are beginning here with appropriation items for fulfilling treaties with the Indians of various tribes. What kind of treaties and obligations have we still existing with these Indian tribes?

Mr. HASTINGS. These various treaties referred to, the gentleman will find, were entered into, and the Government agreed to pay these several tribes these amounts.

Mr. TILSON. Are they annuities or debts owing to the Indians? I have not had time to look up the treaties.

Mr. HASTINGS. They are treaties made at an early date. We have not made treaties with the Indians since March 3, 1871. On that date the Government changed its policy of dealing with the Indians. Prior to that time we negotiated treaties with them. Subsequent to that time, for 25 years we made agreements, and for the last 25 or 30 years we have been legislating directly. Treaties, agreements, and legislation, all have the same binding effect and force. Congress can repeal the treaties, it can repeal an agreement, and it can repeal the law.

Therefore, if we agree to pay them a certain annuity in a treaty, it has been carried annually, and you will see that these amounts are carried every year in the bill—last year and this year and years before. I do not think there is any change in language in the several bills—the language is the same and the amounts are the same. Congress makes the appropriation to carry out the treaty stipulations made with the Indians years ago.

Mr. TILSON. It amounts to more than half a million dollars in this group of items.

Mr. HASTINGS. The first four or five lines of this paragraph is an appropriation to pay for the Indian Service throughout the country.

Mr. GOSS. On page 53, line 9, the gentleman will find what the gentleman from Connecticut is referring to.

Mr. TILSON. The summing up paragraph reads—

In all, for said treaty stipulations, not to exceed $571,300.

This is a considerable sum to pay year after year and apparently go on paying forever.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, you must pay it as long as the treaties are in force and effect. It is unthinkable that the United States should ever fail to appropriate to comply with the terms of a treaty.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no; we must not fail. We should fully comply with the letter of these treaties and the spirit as well; and this was the reason prompting my inquiry.

Mr. HASTINGS. In each item there is reference to the law which shows how the Government is obligated.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is it not true that there are Indian treaties under which we have to pay annuities in perpetuity?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. In perpetuity, so long as the Indian lives. Is there any qualification based on their becoming able to support themselves?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is always done, unless it is afterwards capitalized by subsequent agreement.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. There have been agreements to abrogate a treaty and pay them a stipulated amount.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; by subsequent agreement.

Mr. TILSON. After the annuity is capitalized and paid we should have to do something about it if subsequently they came into a poverty-stricken state.

Mr. HASTINGS. Congress undoubtedly would, under those circumstances.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support of the Osage Agency, and for necessary expenses in connection with oil and gas production on the Osage Reservation, Okla., including pay of necessary employees, the tribal attorney and his stenographer, one special attorney in tax and other matters, and pay of tribal officers; repairs to buildings, rent of quarters for employees, traveling expenses, printing, telegraphing and telephoning, and purchase, repair, and operation of automobiles, $175,000, payable from funds held by the United States in trust for the Osage Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of inquiring if there has been any stipulation as to what amounts should be paid for automobiles. In the bill which was considered recently the gentleman from Mississippi, chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. COLLINS], gave notice to the House that he intended to offer that amendment to all appropriation bills. I would like to inquire if that is included in this bill or not?

Mr. HASTINGS. The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], has an amendment to offer at the proper place which will cover all of this, and will cover this automobile, as far as this tribe is concerned, also; that is, it will be a general amendment.

Mr. GOSS. In connection with automobiles?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It will come at the end of the bill.

Mr. GOSS. We may not be able to return to this particular paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the proposed amendment substantially in the same language and does it contain the same limitations as that carried in the agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. The understanding is we hope to come to some unanimity on this automobile business in all of our appropriation bills. We may have to thresh it out in the Senate somewhat, but the amendment which I have here to offer at the end of the bill covers automobiles all the way through all the activities of this department.

Mr. STAFFORD. It limits the amount which any department may use for the purchase of an automobile to $750?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire further whether this is the action of the full committee in determining that policy, or is it merely the conclusion of the subcommittee which has charge of this bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, I understand this is the will of the full committee, the entire Appropriations Committee, for all appropriation bills. They are not singling out this bill. It is a policy that we are attempting to initiate in Congress for a limitation upon this automobile business. The automobile business in the Government service is coming to be an enormous expense.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the amendment was originally offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] to the Agriculture Department appropriation bill no reference was made in the discussion to the fact that it was the determination of the full committee as a committee policy.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. As far as the Interior Department Subcommittee on Appropriations is concerned, this matter has never come to our attention at all and it has not been considered by the entire Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOSS. I understand from the gentleman from Colorado that the entire committee had passed upon this. I now understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that the committee has not had the matter brought to its attention.

Mr. MURPHY. I may say, to clear the atmosphere, that that amendment applied to the Agriculture Department appropriation bill. It was the sense of our committee that the same thing would apply to all subcommittees and the bills that we were handling.

Mr. HASTINGS. It was therefore discussed in connection with the Agriculture Department appropriation bill.

Mr. MURPHY. It was discussed in connection with that bill, but not in connection with the Interior Department bill.

Mr. GOSS. The entire committee is going to support the program of limiting the purchase of automobiles to $750 in all departments?

Mr. MURPHY. I would not want to go that far.

Mr. GOSS. Well, how far do we go?

Mr. MURPHY. We are going along with the chairman of our subcommittee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I object to discussing the amendment until it has been offered.

Mr. GOSS. Well, the gentleman says he intends to offer it later, but we are making an appropriation for $175,000 for the purpose of the operation of automobiles, and we are right there now. I do not know what the gentleman will do later. We are right here now discussing this very matter.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, we have been discussing this matter. We have taken it up with the chairman of the main committee and with the ranking member, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and this amendment which we have worked out among ourselves is our idea of what ought to go into all appropriation bills.

Mr. GOSS. But we have not had the benefit of the amendment, and yet we are right at this part of the bill which is making appropriation for automobiles.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But this amendment applies all the way through this bill and is to apply to all of these bills. It is not only in connection with the Bureau of Indian Affairs but it is in connection with the national parks and the Geological Survey and all other bureaus. There is no use putting in this amendment at this time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph for the purpose of calling the attention of the membership to the enormous sum that is being expended by every department of the Government for traveling expenses. In the Agriculture Department appropriation bill just passed, nearly $4,000,000 was appropriated for traveling expenses. That is enough to take an army of 40,000 men across the Nation from Washington, D. C., to San Francisco.

In the present bill $1,331,266 is appropriated. It is time that the House should realize this amount should be materially lessened.

I desire to further call the attention of the House to the statement which was recently published by the Bureau of the Budget, wherein it showed that 732,460 people were employed in the executive branches of our Government. In the days of John Adams there were 5,200 people in the employ of all branches of the Government. At the beginning of Lincoln's administration there were only 40,000. To-day in all branches of National Government more than 800,000 are employed. We can best serve the country by diminishing the number of Government commissions and unnecessary employees.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. Does the gentleman contend that by reducing these items we will be saving the taxpayers of his district any money?

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. I am not interested in the taxpayers of my district alone. I have offered amendments to save money for the taxpayer directly affecting expenditures in the district which I represent. The number of employees in the executive branch of the National Government alone, with their salaries and the number in each salary class, is as follows:

(Compiled in January, 1932, from latest available information)

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the members of the subcommittee about this mining trustee.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I am pretty familiar with that, and I will say to the gentleman that they have a lot of segregated coal lands that have not been sold. I may be mistaken about the acreage, but I think there are 300,000 or 400,000 acres of coal deposits, and this mining trustee is paid from the tribal funds for looking after the leases, the collection of royalties, and other things that are incident to the collection of royalties.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Has he anything to do with oil leases?

Mr. HASTINGS. Nothing whatever.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. The only tribe that has any funds is the Seminole Tribe, is it not?

Mr. HASTINGS. The Seminole Tribe and the Choctaw Tribe have small amounts. I have those figures in my office and I will put them in the RECORD. The Seminoles have, I should say, approximately $200,000.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. I am curious to know about this mining trustee, because questions are all the time coming up about oil leases, and if this mining trustee has any jurisdiction over oil leases I would like to know it.

Mr. HASTINGS. He does not have any jurisdiction over oil leases.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. None whatever?

Mr. HASTINGS. None whatever. Let me say to the gentleman that a nonrestricted Indian makes his oil leases just a white man makes his oil leases; but if he is a restricted Indian the lease is initiated through a subordinate official of the Interior Department, and then it is sent to the department for approval.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. But this mining trustee has nothing whatever to do with that?

Mr. HASTINGS. Nothing whatever.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. In the matter of the proposed amendment touching a limitation on the prices of automobiles that may be purchased, I have understood just now from the chairman of the subcommittee that an amendment will be proposed. I understand that in a general way it is along the general lines of the amendment that was added to the agricultural appropriation bill.

Members will recall that that amendment was added not by the subcommittee on the agriculture bill, but it has been approved by the House, and I assume that our chairman proposes to follow what he assumes to be the will of the House in offering a somewhat similar amendment.

So far as I am personally concerned I think the amendment that was adopted by the House the other day went altogether too far in accomplishing that which the authors of it sought to accomplish; in other words, I think it went so far as to do the uneconomical thing in forcing this Government to use light-weight cars, for instance, that might be bought for $750, in places where you ought to use cars that would cost several hundred dollars more than that and which if bought would result in economy. I do not care to discuss the question at this particular time, but I do think that amendment went too far. In view of the fact that the question has been raised as to whether or not the same amendment is to be proposed to this bill, it seems to me we ought to think of it as applied to the services that are performed by the Interior Department, such work as is carried on by the National Park Service, by the Geological Survey, by the Reclamation Service, and by the Public Land Office where cars will be used over rough terrain, where you have mountains to climb, and where oftentimes, in cases of emergency, you have speed to make, and where it would be the uneconomical and unwise thing to limit the departments to the use of types of cars that could be purchased for $750.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I rise again to try to have the atmosphere clarified as to whether the proposal which the chairman of the subcommittee is going to offer is the result of full committee action or is it merely the result of the action of the subcommittee? The chairman of the subcommittee stated that the full committee had determined on this policy as to all appropriation bills, but that was controverted by the gentleman from Ohio, the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee. If it is the committee's action, I would like to know it in determining my policy on this question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say that we talked this matter over.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who are "we"?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say the 35 members of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. I do not know whether all were there or not, but two or three times the question arose as to what ought to be done about automobiles. We have talked it over at various times, and it is my understanding that we rather delegated to the chairman of the committee and the ranking member of it, Mr. WOOD, the authority to work out some fair and concrete action. I understand the proposed amendment I have here is the same one that was adopted on the agricultural bill. That is my understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the full committee ever consider the objections just raised by the gentleman from Idaho, that whereas in city districts, over well-paved roads, light automobiles might be serviceable, yet in services requiring hard usage it would not be economical to purchase a light automobile that could not stand the wear and tear that would be necessitated by the service.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be better for us to discuss this when we reach it instead of at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is informing even now to get our minds fixed upon the subject rather than to consider it as it was considered when the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill was under consideration, and have it thrown at us without knowing the form of the amendment and then have it gulped down by a large body of the membership without knowing what they were doing.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that if we pass this paragraph now, where we are discussing appropriations for automobiles, and go on with the bill, that the gentleman later on is going to offer an amendment that may interfere with this amount. Would we have the privilege of returning to the paragraph or what would be the status in that respect?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will answer the parliamentary inquiry. Once the paragraph is passed it can not be returned to except by unanimous consent, and no amendment would be in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOSS. So that the amendment which the gentleman may offer later on would not pertain to this particular paragraph unless the gentleman obtained unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no knowledge of what amendment the gentleman from Colorado proposes to offer and can not answer that question.

Mr. GOSS. But the gentleman could not offer any amendment that would change this particular paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not propose to answer that question until the amendment is offered.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. In line 9 change $175,000 to $250,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: On page 57, in line 11, strike out "$175,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$250,000."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, the committee has been informed that later on in the day or at the end of the bill the gentleman in charge of the bill is going to offer an amendment which, if we understand the gentleman correctly, may limit the purchase price of new automobiles to $750. If it is the desire of the committee not to have such a limitation, I am offering this amendment to increase the amount by $75,000, so that if in the judgment of the committee we could purchase higher-priced cars, we then would be in a position to purchase such better articles in the form of automobiles. I trust the amendment will pass, so that the House may have the benefit of having higher grade and better automobiles for this particular department.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to get the angle of the gentleman. Is the gentleman doing this for the benefit of the Indians or for Government service, or for the benefit of the employees who ride in the automobiles, or for the benefit of the automobile manufacturers?

Mr. GOSS. I would say to the gentleman that I am doing this for the benefit of the Government service for this reason. I do not think we can sit here and say that no car of higher price than $750 is the most economical to run over mountainous roads and through deserts and in various other places. A higher-speed car or a higher-powered car, costing a few hundred dollars more, might answer the purpose better.

Mr. BLANTON. The ordinary employee of the Government who is out in the field service can use a $600 Ford or a $600 Chevrolet or some other car of that stamp for about one-half the cost of upkeep and maintenance in comparison with a car of higher price, and he can get a car of this kind fixed anywhere along the road if something happens to it. He can get it repaired in an ordinary blacksmith shop, if there are any left in the country. He can get it fixed by any ordinary mechanic along the road. If he gets a higher-priced car, the chances are that when some little thing happens to the machine he has to send it to some big city where they have a special service department. I know of an instance where something happened to a little spring that is on the timer, and the Government employee, who had a higher-priced car, did not know what was the matter with it. A mechanic, who knew something about such matters, fixed it in two minutes.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman may be right, but as one legislator I do not feel like stating that only one-priced car would fit all the needs under all conditions in mountainous country, in rocky country, or in a country where there are various brooks and streams or deserts. I think this should be left to the discretion of those who have had experience in these matters.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman had any practical experience in these matters?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I have driven over the mountains and the plains of the West.

Mr. BLANTON. In the higher-priced cars?

Mr. GOSS. And also in Fords and Chevrolets.

Mr. BLANTON. My experience has been that you can manipulate Fords and Chevrolets with a much smaller maintenance and operating charge, and this would mean a great deal of saving to the Government.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The economists ought to go one step further and require all men in the Indian Service to use nothing but Indian motor cycles.

Mr. GOSS. Yes; we might reduce it still further, but I am for going up into the little higher priced cars.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. What are the makes of cars in the $750 class at the present time?

Mr. GOSS. I assume the Ford and Chevrolet. I do not know of any other particular make—perhaps the Plymouth.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. After that facetious remark of the "chief justice from New York" [Mr. BLACK] I suggest to our friend Mr. George Rothwell Brown that he take back what he said to the effect that there are no real humorists left in the House.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman know whether there is any concerted action on the part of certain Members to limit the price of these cars for the benefit of automobile manufacturers?

Mr. GOSS. That may be so. I can not answer that.

Mr. HASTINGS. In Oklahoma we appropriate $175,000 to administer the affairs of the Indians out of their own funds. I take it the gentleman does not intend by his amendment to appropriate $75,000 additional out of the tribal funds to buy automobiles.

Mr. GOSS. We give them that privilege. They do not have to spend the money because we appropriate it.

Mr. HASTINGS. It does not give the individual the right.

Mr. GOSS. But you are going to offer an amendment that would not allow them to buy any automobile of higher price than $750.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman certainly is not serious in wishing to appropriate $75,000 to buy automobiles to administer the affairs of 2,200 Indians.

Mr. GOSS. If you will offer your amendment and get it before the House, it would stop a lot of this argument.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of which I hold a copy in my hand is to be offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]. He says he will introduce it later. I take it from a hasty reading that it is practically the same amendment which was tied to the agricultural bill, on motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], with the exception that it does not apply to the Cabinet member's automobile, which was undoubtedly made because of my objections.

The Secretary of Agriculture gave me a memorandum, which I read to the House several days ago, protesting against the similar Collins amendment. The Secretary of Agriculture's memorandum said it would wreck the auto service of the Bureau of Public Roads. He said further that from the Road Bureau's long experience they had come to the conclusion that buying about a 3,000-pound car in the neighborhood of $1,000 was cheaper than to buy a lower-priced car, and, moreover, that they did not want their men to travel in an open car exposed to severe weather.

Now, the amendment prevents the use of Government automobiles between the home and the place of business. So the employees of the Bureau of Public Roads in the Rocky Mountain district and the plains of the West could not go from their cabins or their homes or hotels to their place of business, 50 or, perhaps, 100 or 300 miles away. This would wreck the Reclamation Service, it would wreck the Irrigation Service, and it would wreck the National Park Service and many Interior Department services.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLANCY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I would like to ask my good friend from Michigan and my good friend from Connecticut if they are in favor of taking $75,000 additional out of the tribal funds of the Osage Indians for the purpose of buying automobiles for Government officials? I think an answer to that question would settle the whole proposition.

Mr. CLANCY. I will say to my good friend from Tennessee that my discussion is on the Collins and Taylor amendments, which will cripple the automobile service of the Government.

Now, it is stated that automobiles owned by States, counties, municipalities, and Federal Government are abused by joy riding and for private business. But what do you propose to do? In general language, which is not carefully thought out, not the deliberate result of hearings, you absolutely curtail and cripple the entire automobile service to restrict private use largely in the city of Washington. It is difficult to write any general language curtailing the use of all Federal automobiles without doing some degree of damage just to hit the abuse in Washington and other Government centers.

The reason I oppose the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is that it will do untold damage and is not carefully prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction, repair, and maintenance of roads on Indian reservations not eligible to Government aid under the Federal highway act, including engineering and supervision, and the purchase of material, equipment, supplies, and the employment of Indian labor, $400,000: Provided, That where practicable the Secretary of the Interior shall arrange with the local authorities to defray the maintenance expenses of roads constructed hereunder and to cooperate in such construction.

Mr. LEAVITT offered the following amendment:

On page 59, line 6, after the word "construction," strike out the period, insert a semicolon and the following: "Provided further, That not more than 20 per cent of the amount expended on any project under this appropriation shall be expended for any purposes other than Indian labor."

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to make certain that what Congress had in mind in authorizing this appropriation is always carried out. When the authorizing act was passed it was very plain that the intention of Congress was to provide two things. One was the improvement of the Indian reservations through road building, and the other, of greatest importance, was labor for the Indians. My fear is that as the years go by there will be a tendency to spend too much of this money for the purchase of machinery and other purposes outside of the labor which we intend to supply for the Indians. I have therefore offered this amendment as a limitation.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. COLTON. In cases where they are unable to get sufficient Indian labor, would that not tie the hands of the bureau too much?

Mr. LEAVITT. Well, I do not know of any such case that could come under the purposes for which this money is appropriated. It was definitely appropriated, not merely to build roads on Indian reservations, but to provide labor for Indians while the roads were being constructed.

Mr. COLTON. Very often Federal-aid roads are being constructed across the reservation——

Mr. LEAVITT. Not under this appropriation.

Mr. COLTON. But I was going to say, in constructing roads leading to Federal-aid roads, there might be a situation where sufficient Indian labor could not be secured.

Mr. LEAVITT. That kind of road would be constructed under the act sponsored by the gentleman from Utah for the building of roads and trails on Indian reservations and public lands. This is an item that has but one definite purpose. The gentleman will recall the history of it. The bill came from the Senate authorizing the expenditure of $250,000 for roads on Indian reservations. It was amended in the House to provide a general authorization and projects for the use of Indian labor. It was definitely dedicated to the furnishing of that labor rather than just the construction of roads. We have two other methods under which those other roads could be constructed.

Mr. COLTON. My thought is that the bureau would probably exercise the wisest discretion in choosing labor, and would make every effort to get Indian labor, but if it could not get Indians, there ought to be authority to employ white people.

Mr. LEAVITT. I do not think they should be authorized to use this money for the building of roads where Indian labor is not available. That is the purpose of this very bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman proposes to ban Indian labor if more than 20 per cent is required?

Mr. LEAVITT. No; to make certain that they can not spend more than 20 per cent of this appropriation on any project for anything except Indian labor.

Mr. STAFFORD. That means that 80 per cent shall be expended for Indian labor?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; in every case, at least that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman construe his interpretation of the word "available"? We have a great number of Indians in Wisconsin. We started a lumber mill years back at Neopit, on the Menominee Indian Reservation. We used some two or three million of the trust funds to try to give those Indians employment, but we found the proverbial nature of the Indians to be that they would not work. What assurance can the gentleman give that the Indians of his country, even if they are available in numbers, will work on these roads?

Mr. LEAVITT. Because this has been in effect for two years and it has been one of the ways of providing enough money for these Indians to live on. They do work and they work well and successfully in the construction of these roads.

That is the only purpose for which this appropriation is authorized. I am very anxious that we make sure, as the years go by, that those who administer it in the field are not allowed to forget the purpose of this particular appropriation.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. If it can not be used for any other purpose than for the employment of Indians, Indians will be employed, will they not?

Mr. LEAVITT. Absolutely.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Does not the gentleman believe he can cover the intent of his amendment and yet not entirely tie the hands of the department, by using the words "where practical"? That will show the intent of Congress and the intent of the appropriation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. That is simply offered as a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. LEAVITT. Well, I do not believe that is required. I think it should be passed just the way it is drawn, because I want this thing to be air-tight.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. The suggestion would let the department out. On that language they would say, "It is not practical to secure Indians," and therefore they would spend it for the employment of white persons.

Mr. LEAVITT. Exactly.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance and repair of that portion of the Gallup-Shiprock highway within the Navajo Reservation, N. Mex., including the purchase of machinery, $20,000, reimbursable as provided in the act of June 7, 1924: Provided, That other than for supervision and engineering only Indian labor shall be employed for such maintenance and repair work.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER of Wyoming: On page 59, line 13, after the period, insert the following:

"That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $150,000 contained in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1931, for one-half of the cost for reconstruction and improvement of the road running from Milford across the Wind River or Shoshone Indian Reservation, through Fort Washakie to the diversion dam in Wyoming, is hereby continued available until June 30, 1933: Provided, That not to exceed $5,000 of the said appropriation is hereby made available for payment for rights of way across Indian lands and payment of the total irrigation construction costs and accrued operation and maintenance charges on affected lands: Provided further, That the provision in the act of May 27, 1930 (46 Stat. 430), requiring employment of Indian labor except for engineering and supervision, shall not apply to the funds provided by the State of Wyoming."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will reserve it.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, the Seventy-first Congress authorized an appropriation of not to exceed $150,000 for the building of a highway over the Shoshone Indian Reservation in Wyoming. This was not to exceed one-half of the cost of the road. Every foot of this road is on an Indian reservation. The State of Wyoming had to pay at least $150,000, and before that money was available it had to enter into a contract with the Government that it would forever maintain the road. In addition to that it had to employ Indian labor. Now, that money could not be used because there was some litigation in regard to the State's part of this road construction. One community of the State felt that the State of Wyoming was paying too much for the construction of a road over an Indian reservation. There was a lawsuit over it, and that is the reason why the State did not use that money.

This is not to increase the appropriation one bit; it is just extending it, and in addition to that we ask to limit the amount used for rights of way not to exceed $5,000. The rights of way go over some Indian reclamation lands and the construction costs run to $45 an acre, and we want to limit the amount which the Government can use in buying rights of way.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, that changes existing law.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the whole amendment or just against a part of it?

Mr. HASTINGS. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'CONNOR). The Chair is ready to rule. The last proviso of the gentleman's amendment is sufficient to sustain the point of order, for the reason that Chapter 343, Forty-sixth Statutes at Large, the act of May 27, 1930, contains the provision that only Indian labor shall be employed except for engineering and supervision. Under this amendment it is attempted to exempt the State of Wyoming from that provision, which would clearly be legislation on this appropriation bill and would not be in order.

Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment with that proviso stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER of Wyoming: On page 59, line 13, after the period, insert the following: "That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $150,000 contained in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1931, for one-half of the cost for reconstruction and improvement of the road running from Milford across the Wind River or Shoshone Indian Reservation, through Fort Washakie to the diversion dam in Wyoming, is hereby continued available until June 30, 1933: Provided, That not to exceed $5,000 of the said appropriation is hereby made available for payment for rights of way across Indian lands and payment of the total irrigation construction costs and accrued operation and maintenance charges on affected lands."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment based on the last proviso, on the ground that it changes existing law.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I do not think it changes existing law. All it does is to limit the amount they may spend for rights of way.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am informed that the existing law does not contain the proviso:

That not to exceed $5,000 of the said appropriation is hereby made available for payment for rights of way across Indian lands—

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma cite the law to which he refers?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not have it at hand, but I am advised that the act of 1931 does not contain this proviso; that, therefore, this proviso changes that provision; that it is in addition to what was in the 1931 law; and if so, of course, it changes existing law and is subject to the point of order.

I think the gentleman from Wyoming will concede that this is an amendment of existing law.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. No; I do not concede that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman say that this proviso is in the act of 1931?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. No; but I do not think it is new legislation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the gentleman agrees that this proviso is not in the act of 1931?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. No; if it was in the act of 1931 I would not be offering it here.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then it is admitted by the gentleman from Wyoming that it is not in the act of 1931.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the proviso merely places a restriction on the amount that may be expended for a heretofore-authorized service, clearly that is within the authority of the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'CONNOR). The Chair will state to the gentleman that his quandary is due to the fact there is included in this amendment a provision for payment for rights of way, which authority the Chair can not find in the act of May 27, 1930. The act of May 27, 1930, provides for the reconstruction and improvement of a road, and there is no mention therein of payment for rights of way.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. The obtaining of rights of way is incidental to the building of a road.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no provision for such expenditure in the original act, and for that reason the Chair is constrained to hold the amendment out of order and sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment with that portion stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER of Wyoming: On page 59, line 13, after the period, insert the following: "That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $150,000 contained in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1931, for one-half of the cost for reconstruction and improvement of the road running from Milford across the Wind River or Shoshone Indian Reservation, through Fort Washakie to the diversion dam in Wyoming, is hereby continued available until June 30, 1933."

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, the last Congress authorized and appropriated $150,000 for the building of a highway over the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation in Wyoming. The State of Wyoming had to pay an amount equivalent at least to the $150,000. Before this amount was available they had to enter into an agreement with the Government that they would forever maintain the road. A municipality in the county in which this reservation is located brought a suit against the State of Wyoming endeavoring to restrain the State from the building of this road for the reason they felt the State of Wyoming was offering too much for a 30-mile road every foot of which was in an Indian reservation. This is the reason we were not able to use the money, and all we now ask is to extend the appropriation that was provided in the act of the Seventy-first Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman submitted this to the Bureau of Indian Affairs?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I may state that this amendment was drawn by the Bureau of Indian Affairs and met with their whole-hearted approval. They drew the amendment as it was first offered.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Was not this in the deficiency bill and was it not stricken out a short time ago?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Yes; it was purely out of order in the deficiency bill, because it was neither authorized by the Budget nor did it meet with the approval of the Executive at that time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Personally, I do not know that there ought to be any objection to this matter; but, on the other hand, I do feel that this is not the way to bring in such legislation. The Bureau of the Budget has given this committee no statement about the matter, and we do not know anything about it. I do feel that any objection would be not so much to the substance as to the manner in which the gentleman is bringing in the amendment when we do not know whether it is wise legislation or not. I feel that it is a matter that should come in in a more regular way and that the gentleman should present it to the committee for its consideration before offering it on the floor of the House. If we are to permit amendments of this kind we may admit items that should not be approved.

The provision of the bill to which the gentleman is offering this amendment is a separate law that Senator Bursum, of New Mexico, handled in the Senate and I handled in the House several years ago, appropriating in perpetuity $20,000 a year for the maintenance of a road between Gallup and Shiprock in New Mexico and in Colorado—a road that took us about 15 years to get built.

I feel that the gentleman from Oklahoma was perfectly correct in objecting to this amendment as being wholly foreign and not germane to this item.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. The gentleman from Oklahoma has not raised a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the provision is necessary, it is necessary because we have got to change present law. If he does not have to change present law, the gentleman does not need this amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. May I again state that the gentleman from Oklahoma has not raised a point of order on this amendment?

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CARTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all expenditures authorized by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 388), and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, known as the reclamation law, and all other acts under which expenditures from said fund are authorized, including not to exceed $178,000 for personal services and $16,000 for other expenses in the office of the chief engineer; $25,000 for telegraph, telephone, and other communication service; $7,000 for photographing and making photographic prints; $54,000 for personal services; and $12,000 for other expenses in the field legal offices; examination of estimates for appropriations in the field; refunds of overcollections and deposits for other purposes; not to exceed $20,000 for lithographing, engraving, printing, and binding; purchase of ice; purchase of rubber boots for official use by employees; maintenance and operation of horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; not to exceed $40,000 for purchase and exchange of horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; packing, crating, and transportation (including drayage) of personal effects of employees upon permanent change of station, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; payment of damages caused to the owners of lands or other private property of any kind by reason of the operations of the United States, its officers, or employees in the survey, construction, operation, or maintenance of irrigation works, and which may be compromised by agreement between the claimant and the Secretary of the Interior, or such officers as he may designate; payment for official telephone service in the field hereafter incurred in case of official telephones installed in private houses when authorized under regulations established by the Secretary of the Interior; not to exceed $1,000 for expenses, except membership fees, of attendance, when authorized by the Secretary, upon meetings of technical and professional societies required in connection with official work of the bureau; payment of rewards, when specifically authorized by the Secretary of the Interior, for information leading to the apprehension and conviction of persons found guilty of the theft, damage, or destruction of public property: Provided, That no part of said appropriations may be used for maintenance of headquarters for the Bureau of Reclamation outside the District of Columbia except for an office for the chief engineer and staff and for certain field officers of the division of reclamation economics: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior in his administration of the Bureau of Reclamation is authorized to contract for medical attention and service for employees and to make necessary pay-roll deductions agreed to by the employees therefor: Provided further, That no part of any sum provided for in this act for operation and maintenance of any project or division of a project by the Bureau of Reclamation shall be used for the irrigation of any lands within the boundaries of an irrigation district which has contracted with the Bureau of Reclamation and which is in arrears for more than 12 months in the payment of any charges due the United States, and no part of any sum provided for in this act for such purpose shall be used for the irrigation of any lands which have contracted with the Bureau of Reclamation and which are in arrears for more than 12 months in the payment of any charges due from said lands to the United States.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee, if on page 62, lines 17, 18, and 19, he intends to have the amendment he is going to offer later apply to this $40,000?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The way it was put in the agricultural bill, and the way our leaders on the Appropriations Committee have handed it to me, it applies to everything in this bill; it covers all the activities of the department. In fact, they are trying to adopt some orderly system in relation to automobiles. It may not be this one. It may be changed in the Senate or adjusted in conference. But there is a determination at both ends of the Capitol, and on both sides of the House, that there ought to be some positive system with relation to automobiles, because it has grown to such proportions that it is one of our very large expenditures. Everybody realizes that in this uncontrolled way of purchasing automobiles there are abuses. Some of the departments apply economy, but others have high-priced cars for some subordinates.

Mr. GOSS. Has the gentleman consulted with the gentleman from Idaho and others of the subcommittee on this particular item?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. All of these matters have been gone over by the committee.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman state if there is any department of the Government that uses automobiles that have been taken from the bootleggers?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know anything about the bootleggers.

Mr. GOSS. Has he consulted with the gentleman from Idaho on the subcommittee about this particular item?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. All these matters have been considered by the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for the purpose of answering the gentleman's question?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman asked if the gentleman from Colorado knew of any department which turned over bootleggers' automobiles to that department. I will say that only an hour ago there was handed to me in my capacity as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, a draft of a bill providing for that very thing—that hereafter all cars taken and condemned as bootleggers' cars, instead of being sold or given away, as has been the practice, shall instantly become the property of the Interior Department.

Mr. GOSS. Let me say to the gentleman that it costs considerable to operate Cadillacs and high-priced cars.

Mr. HOWARD. My Indians are very careful to hold down expenses in such matters, and I am sure the legislation will be enacted, because it will come to the House from my committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman does not think the Indians would object to riding in these high-priced cars, does he?

Mr. HOWARD. Not yet.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that this matter was discussed in the full committee, but not in the subcommittee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we talked the matter over in the subcommittee, but we did not decide upon any definite plan and did not put any provision in the bill, but left it to the full committee, so that we could have some united and carefully considered system between the two Houses.

Mr. GOSS. The subcommittee has not had the matter before them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; but we talked about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman. During the hearings was there any statement of the policy of the various respective services in the purchase of automobiles?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that we had furnished us a list of all automobiles that had been purchased by the various bureaus of this department. Nearly all of them were inexpensive cars.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking to ascertain whether the Interior Department is subject to criticism in any of their respective services for purchasing high-priced automobiles which are beyond the character required for the respective services. Here we have an appropriation of $40,000. Upon what is that predicated, as to the character of car that is supposed to be purchased? Is it a $500 car; is it a bantam car for $300? Is it a thousand-dollar car? What is the recommendation of the department as to the character of car that is necessary for the respective services?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for me to answer his question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman all of my time and more.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have a table here for the entire Interior Department, a statement of automobiles, the price, the class, purchased during 1931 and 1932 and the estimated prices in 1933.

In the Indian Service there were 309 cars in 1931; the same number in 1932. The price of those cars ranged from $400 to $600.

The Bureau of Reclamation has 40 cars, ranging from $400 to $600 in 1931. In 1932 they had 45 cars, ranging from $400 to $600.

In 1933 they ask for 33 cars, ranging from $400 to $600.

In 1931 they had three cars, ranging from $600 to $800. In 1932 they had 10 cars, ranging from $600 to $800. In 1933 they ask for 10, ranging from $600 to $800.

In 1931 they had three, ranging from $800 to $1,000. In 1932 they had seven, ranging from $800 to $1,000, and in 1933 they ask for seven, ranging from $800 to $1,000.

In 1931 they had but two automobiles over $1,000. In 1932 they had three over $1,000, and 1933 they ask for three over $1,000.

I have the same table for the land office, the Geological Survey, the national parks, St. Elizabeths Insane Asylum, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do those figures for the other services substantially confirm the character of cars that are used in the Indian Service?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; substantially.

Mr. STAFFORD. As far as the gentleman has given the tabulation for the Indian Service I can not see that there has been any abuse whatsoever in the utilization of the appropriation for the purchase of passenger automobiles.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The only possible extravagance, if any, as far as the Interior Department is concerned would be in those cars that cost over $1,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the maximum price for those two or three cars?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This statement does not show.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, they might have been $1,200, and the gentleman would not contend that was an abuse.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The only place I could see where the Interior Department might be exceeding the limit probably is in the National Park Service. We have not come to that yet. In the National Park Service there were 11 cars purchased at over $1,000 each.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the maximum price for those 11 cars?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have not the figure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose they were $1,200. Would the gentleman say that was an abuse?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Gentlemen, what the Committee on Appropriations is trying to do is to adopt some uniform system for all the departments and have a definite regulation. I understand that some of them have been buying much higher-priced cars than others. I feel that is not fair to the other departments or to the Government itself. We would be very glad to have the judgment of the House on what it should do, and when the matter goes to the Senate we will have to thresh it out with those gentlemen and then it will go to conference. I feel there is no use having a running-fire debate on this thing all day or indefinitely. We discussed this matter in our committee.

We have not put anything in this bill, but it is a matter that has been considered for a long time by the various members of the Appropriations Committee. We have deferred definite action on the matter to come to some concerted regulation about it. If the Members of the House are in favor of taking off the brakes and letting these departments spend whatever they please, it is up to the House to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, that is not my purpose, but I do say the House should have some hearings and some intelligent testimony upon which to act. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Has the gentleman's committee conducted any hearings on the question comprised in the gentleman's proposed amendment that the persons employed and using these cars are forbidden to use them in going to and from their work?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Our committee has not held any stated or public hearings on that matter at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I strenuously contested that proposal when it was first offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] as being unworkable, and I still say it is. I still say that large commercial houses that allow their employees the use of a car in business pursuits permit them to use them going to and from work, and with that provision embodied, the amendment is ridiculous and unworkable.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. I just want to make an observation with reference to this particular bill. The Interior Department is one department of the Government that has not imposed on the Treasury of the United States in providing unusual automobiles in which to ride. Our committee spent almost four months last year visiting and inspecting the various activities of this department. At no time did we find anything about which to complain along the lines of automobiles.

If in the activities of the Interior Department they would need to go a little higher than $750, I am sure there is not a member of this subcommittee who would not want to go along with them and provide a higher-priced car for the people who are working honestly and fairly with the United States Treasury and the people. I believe all of the members of this subcommittee would want to help them get the right kind of a car. We all know it is not economy to buy a $750 car to go out over these rough mountain roads. We know they need cars that are heavier and better. But here we are charged with the responsibility of taking care of an appropriation bill. We want the Members of the House to help us, because we are dealing fairly with the House. The Interior Department has dealt fairly with the committee, and we hope you will allow us to get this bill through the House the way it is written, or as nearly as possible as written, and I feel sure that in the end you will be well pleased.

Mr. PERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I presume I represent the largest automobile district in the country. I think 80 per cent of the automobiles of the country are manufactured in my district. I think there are at least 15 plants manufacturing automobiles in that district, ranging in price from three hundred and some odd dollars to better than $7,000. If the price should be limited to $750, I imagine they would all have to be bought in my district, because I think it is the only district that makes cars under that value. There may be one or two that make them under that value in other parts of the country, but at least four make them under that value in my district. So I am not objecting because the business is not coming into my community. But I want to say this: That we who have grown up with the automobile industry and who have seen these cars grow and develop know that very often for $50 or $75 more than $750 you get a car that answers an entirely different purpose and does an entirely different thing 50 per cent more economically than the $750 car. We know, for instance, in this district that the Hudson car can do a certain particular thing that no other car can do so well, and we know also that the Ford car, manufactured in my district, can do a certain other thing just as well as the car that costs $500 or $1,000 more. We know they all fill their particular place. We also know that a real business institution, an institution that is run on a business plan, sits down deliberately and, with its mind working and with its pencil sharpened, determines just which car is the true economy; and I would hope that if this House is to tackle this very important subject from the point of view of economy, that it would allow some committee somewhere to sit down and find out about it from the point of view of both car and price, as business men find out about it, and that no arbitrary limit of price regardless of car as proposed use or purpose be established.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. With a very few Members upon the floor of the House a few weeks ago the very dangerous Collins amendment was tied to the agricultural appropriation bill. The gentleman from Colorado has said it is his intention to introduce a similar amendment to the Interior Department bill late to-day, when probably there will be very few Members here. Thirty-four Members put through the other dangerous amendment, only 8 per cent of this House. We certainly do not want a similar amendment to come up without the Members knowing what it means and with only a handful of Members present to vote. That is not fair.

The Secretary of Agriculture said with regard to the amendment which was tied to the agricultural appropriation bill that it wrecked his service in the Bureau of Good Roads. These proponents say they want economy. The Secretary of Agriculture said that over a detailed cost-keeping period of six years they proved absolutely that a 3,000-pound car costing in the neighborhood of $1,000 was more economical than the lowest-priced cars.

I want also to make this point: You can not buy the lowest-priced cars in the Rocky Mountains or distant States delivered—and the freight must be counted as a part of the $750—you can not buy the lowest-priced closed cars made in the Central States in the Rocky Mountains or on the Pacific coast for $750, and I make that statement on information furnished by experts in the automotive industry.

What did the Secretary of Agriculture say with respect to this limitation of $750 which was put on the agricultural appropriation bill? He said that it meant, first, an increased cost in the operation of the cars themselves; second, that it meant an increased number of personnel to make the inspections required on Federal-aid projects, and he submitted a cost chart which I placed in the RECORD on February 2, and in that statement he concluded in this way:

It will be noted that these costs have steadily declined since 1929, when we began to use cars in the 3,000-pound class.

Not a single Member of this House can object to any intelligent amendment aimed at curbing joy riding; no intelligent Member can object to getting the lowest-priced car which is the most economical. What we want is real and not false economy.

What was the statement made by gentlemen who tied the Collins amendment onto the agricultural appropriation bill? That there are a lot of Government servants using Rolls-Royce automobiles and they aimed to prevent the practice. I stated to one of the gentlemen that the Rolls-Royce automobile is a foreign-built car and that the American Government is not buying a foreign-built car; in fact, that there is legislation curbing the right of some departments to buy foreign commodities in competition with American commodities.

What we object to is the demagogic appeal to the country that is being made by saying that Government officials are using Rolls-Royce automobiles or cars costing $4,000 or $5,000 or even more, when, as a matter of fact, the average cost of cars in the Department of Agriculture is $971.04, and there they are using the cars which experience has shown are the most economical. When the Bureau of Standards made their auto tests when we were entering the war, did they recommend the lowest-priced car? They did not. The War Department bought $10,000,000 worth of cars of one make in one purchase, which were cars of the heavier type, with heavier materials, and they are being used now in the Government service after 15 or 16 years of heavy use, which proves that the Bureau of Standards and War Department were absolutely right.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ten per cent of the foregoing amounts shall be available interchangeably for expenditures on the reclamation projects named; but not more than 10 per cent shall be added to the amount appropriated for any one of said projects, except that should existing works or the water supply for lands under cultivation be endangered by floods or other unusual conditions an amount sufficient to make necessary emergency repairs shall become available for expenditure by further transfer of appropriation from any of said projects upon approval of the Secretary of the Interior;

Total, from reclamation fund, $3,089,360.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. THURSTON: Page 69, line 9, strike out all of the paragraph commencing with line 9, page 69, to include all of line 12 on page 71.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Have we not read that paragraph and passed it?

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, it is all one paragraph.

Mr. SWING. No; the bill is being read by paragraphs, and I make the point of order that in the reading of an appropriation bill an amendment must be offered as the bill is read, paragraph by paragraph, and therefore the amendment now offered is not in order because it is offered too late.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'CONNOR). In looking through the bill the Chair finds quite a number of paragraphs ending with a semicolon, and, although these paragraphs are divided by semicolons, they are separate paragraphs, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We have just completed reading the various items relating to appropriations for the Reclamation Service. I notice that the committee has reduced the budgetary estimate for the total service $1,279,000. I heartily commend the committee for this generous cut, especially in view of the fact that a majority of the Members on the subcommittee come from Western States.

However, I would like to know what policy the committee followed in making this cut, and also the reason the committee voted $800,000 for continuing the Yakima project.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will ask the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FRENCH. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I was diverted for the moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asking, generally, as to the policy the committee followed in making a cut of $1,279,000, and what policy the committee followed in voting appropriations for continuing construction as, for instance, the Yakima project of $800,000, although this is $500,000 below the budgetary estimate.

Mr. FRENCH. The committee followed with regard to reclamation the policy that I indicated we had followed with respect to reclamation upon Indian lands. We endeavored not to include any new projects or carry moneys for work that could properly be stopped at this time. There were two thoughts in view: In the first place, we did not want, at a time like this, to aggravate the economic situation touching agriculture by bringing in new areas of land. On the other hand, we were admonished by the diminishing returns of the reclamation fund to make the appropriation as reasonably small as possible.

There were only three sizable projects in the reclamation part of the bill that called for construction work. One of these was Vale, Oreg., where we cut out the entire amount of $674,000, because it was felt that the unit, being reservoir, could be safely stopped at this point without working any great injury to the project that ultimately will be carried forward.

The next project that was sizable was the Owyhee project. Here we carry $1,000,000 by way of reappropriation and $1,000,000 of new money. I think the money that I refer to as a reappropriation is money that was available under the terms of the prior appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain in detail, as that is the largest appropriation, the need of appropriating $2,000,000 for this project in these times.

Mr. FRENCH. The reason we had to carry that item is because here we have a project that will cost something like $17,000,000 when completed, and we are right in the midst of a construction program that, as Doctor Mead, of the Reclamation Service, advised our committee, it would be calamitous for us to stop at this particular time.

Mr. STAFFORD. What acreage will it serve when the project is developed?

Mr. BUTLER. Approximately 200,000 acres.

Mr. FRENCH. Somewhat less than 200,000 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. And what kind of cultivation?

Mr. FRENCH. Diversified crops. It would include grain and alfalfa, fruit, potatoes, and all that kind of agriculture.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, so far as that project is concerned, you are opening further lands for the products of agriculture that will add to the surplus now existing?

Mr. FRENCH. In part, that must be true, and in part it is furnishing more definite water supply for lands inadequately served.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRENCH. Then, passing to the third project, where a sizable amount of money was asked, the Yakima project is much like the Owyhee project. It seemed impossible for the committee to say that we ought to stop on this project, in view of the work that has been carried forward.

Mr. STAFFORD. And how much more will be needed before the project is completed? We may not have launched deeply enough but that we might be warranted in stopping the work entirely.

Mr. FRENCH. It was the thought of the committee that this project has already drawn so large an investment from the Government that it would be unwise and uneconomic to stop at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. That may be as to the Owyhee project, where we have not invested much for construction purposes. Can the gentleman give the amount for construction work completed up to the present time, so that the committee can judge whether it is feasible to order this work stopped?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; I can indicate the outlay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Large industrial organizations are not spending money now for new construction. They are saving it for keeping the concern going.

Mr. FRENCH. We had expended up to June 30, 1931, on the Sunnyside and Tieton divisions of the Yakima project, that will be served by the Cle Elum Reservoir, $14,175,974.

Mr. STAFFORD. And how much more is it estimated to take to complete it?

Mr. FRENCH. The dam itself and appurtenant structures will cost $2,730,000, and by the end of the fiscal year in which we are now operating the dam will be 40 per cent completed. It will be 85 per cent completed in 1933, and it will require an expenditure of $800,000 more than we are carrying in this bill to complete the dam.

Mr. STAFFORD. How about the $2,000,000 appropriation for the Owyhee project—how far advanced is that?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. As to the Cle Elum Dam it is under construction at the present time. The Budget estimate was for $1,000,000 to go ahead with that construction now under way, which is contracted for. The committee, of course, for the time being has eliminated a half million dollars, which we think should be included in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has satisfactorily answered as to the Yakima project. I am now seeking information as to the Owyhee project, for which we appropriated $2,000,000.

Mr. FRENCH. Upon June 30, 1931, we had expended $6,468,636 upon this project. It is a project that will ultimately cost about $17,000,000. Upon the dam itself at the beginning of the present year we had expended $4,775,000.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will permit me, I think perhaps six million will have been expended instead of $4,775,000.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; by the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it will require $11,000,000 then?

Mr. BUTLER. Approximately that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to congratulate the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. BUTLER] in securing that large raid on the Treasury to go ahead with a project of that character at this time, with but a small fraction of the project completed.

Mr. FRENCH. As to these three projects our committee was governed by the outline of policy I indicated when I first started my reply to the gentleman.

Mr. GILCHRIST offered the following amendment:

Page 71, line 12, strike out "$3,089,360" and insert in lieu thereof "30 cents."

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON] proposed an amendment striking out several paragraphs of this bill, including much of pages 69, 70, and 71, but his amendment was held to be out of order for the reason that he had not proposed it at the end of each of the paragraphs. Now, I propose this amendment at the end of the paragraph, hoping to reach the same thing that my colleague desired to reach when he attempted to strike out the entire matter.

Mr. Chairman, in view of what is taking place over the country, in view of the fact that the Farm Board proposes that the farmers should plow up one-third of their cotton lands, in view of this vast surplus of agricultural products that is now being put upon the market, in view of what the farmers are suffering, when they are selling their products in my district at below cost, when the sheriff is selling their lands, it is time that we cut down on Government expenditures and reduce taxes, and especially appropriations which will bring more land into competition with our present farm lands in order that still greater surpluses may be produced to glut the market and prevent a fair price for farm commodities.

In a county adjoining my own the sheriff has sold one-eighth of the land in the last few years. What are the people on the other seven-eighths doing? They are just two jumps ahead of the sheriff with bankruptcy and positive want and destitution in prospect for them.

Of course, I would not have proposed this amendment if there had been leave to discuss the merits of the amendment proposed by my colleague from Iowa, but I think this is in order at this place and therefore it has been proposed.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 4, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KETCHAM offered the following amendment:

Page 71, line 12, strike out the figures "$3,089,360" and insert "$2,939,360."

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, if we will observe this matter for just a moment we will see this total $3,089,000 involves all the expenditures for all the services of the bureau that have been enumerated. I have obtained the best possible information I could as to the amount that is to be set aside to be used for cooperative investigations. The paragraphs which my colleague the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON] had in mind are the paragraphs which are used by the Reclamation Service to lay the plans and to set the stakes to launch the procedure that finally leads us to expenditures of millions and millions of dollars upon reclamation projects. Surveys are made in very innocent little proposals that come before the House, and gradually, inperceptibly, except to those who have a vital interest, they grow into millions of dollars. The gentlemen from the West are here this afternoon, not losing a single point of advantage. Advantage was taken skillfully a few moments ago to head off discussion of this proposition. That is all fair play, and it is all a part of the program. We do not find any fault with those gentlemen at all. That is their business. They are adequately representing their districts when they are fighting for the last dollar. But I come back to the larger proposition and say to you that the time has come when we ought to carefully consider every one of these new projects, and the only way we can reach them in this bill is to nip them in the bud by cutting off investigations for a year or two. [Applause.] One hundred and fifty thousand dollars reduction for investigations will do that business.

I have before me some visual proof of what I have been stating to you, and I would like my friends from the West, who are present looking on with considerable interest, to see this little picture. This came to me in one of my weekly papers, and I will tell you what it is, because you can not see it from where you are. This is a picture of the Columbia River and this is the language that is under the picture. Please listen to it:

A vast area of arid land will be put under cultivation as a result of the two dams which Uncle Sam intends to build across the wild Columbia River, harnessing the tremendous water power that is now going to waste. One of the dams will be at Cascade Rapids, pictured above, and the other will be 75 miles up the river, and barriers, which will cost about $700,000,000, will be built from the mountains on the Oregon side to the mountains on the Washington side of the river.

And here we go, if you please, with some more investigations.

In spite of the fact that for the last two or three years we have been doing our level best to head off an investigation of this project it has advanced to the stage where a news service has gone far enough to picture the identical spot where one of the dams will be built and to name the sum that Uncle Sam will incorporate in a bill.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I can not yield. The gentleman has had his say.

Mr. SWING. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. KETCHAM. I do not yield.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SWING. The gentleman is not discussing anything in this bill when he discusses the Columbia River project because it is not included in any possible form in the investigations that are referred to here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan must confine his remarks to the amendment, and he will proceed in order.

Mr. KETCHAM. The Columbia River involves an investigation, and investigations are provided for in this particular paragraph.

Mr. SWING. The investigation to which the gentleman refers is not included in this bill.

Mr. KETCHAM. The bill includes investigations, and under the general language of this bill I maintain that the Columbia River or any other river may be investigated, and the gentleman knows it all too well.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The dam pictured is many miles below the irrigation project of the Columbia. It is a power project. Irrigation is secondary and will not develop for many years.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state that the Columbia River investigation is not under the Reclamation Bureau but has been conducted under the Board of Army Engineers.

Mr. KETCHAM. Exactly so. I am mighty glad the gentleman stands up here and confesses that what could not be secured in one way has been secured in another way. It shows the versatility of the men from the West. If they can not get their projects started by one means, then they do it by another.

I appeal to you men that now is the time to show the disposition of the House as to these propositions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It looks as though we are not going to finish this bill this afternoon, else I would not impose myself on the committee at this time.

I want to call your attention to the fact that the folks in the country, to which the gentleman has referred, have a right to dream.

I wish every Member of this House could have traveled with our committee as we investigated that great basin country in the State of Washington. I wish they could have traveled with us as we traveled 300 miles over a country that was once happy and prosperous, a country that was peopled by the best American blood, a country that has gone back to desert, a country that is filled with ghost towns, ghost farms; a country where good American men and women ventured, built, lived, and were happy until forsooth the climate changed. Perhaps you do not know about that. I wish you would study it, because it is an unusual thing and not much has been said about it and not much is known about it, save by those who are interested in that country. But it is a tragedy. It is one of the great tragedies of the Northwest. Thousands of good American people went in there and took up little farms; they built their homes and built cities, but they have entirely disappeared. Nothing but the desert is left. However, the people up there are trying to find some way whereby they can bring water onto this land. They are spending much of their own money, and they are dreaming of the day when again they can see that wonderful country blossom as it once did. [Applause.]

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I would like to call attention to the fact that in these numerous items under the Bureau of Reclamation there are reclamation works going on in a number of States, not only in the Rocky Mountain States but in the Plains States—Nebraska and Wyoming. If you accept the amendment, which the gentleman from Colorado proposes to offer, you will find officers and employees working on these projects injured and handicapped most unfairly and most grievously.

Mr. KETCHAM. I will ask my colleague to forego his discussion until my amendment is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Michigan to rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CLANCY. And the amendment was to cut down the appropriation for the Bureau of Reclamation. I am speaking in order.

Mr. KETCHAM. I did not want the Members to lose sight of my amendment.

Mr. CLANCY. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado is adopted, it will mean that in these Rocky Mountain services at the end of the day's work officers and employees will be 5, 10, 15, 20, or 30 miles away from their homes; and, according to the exact language of the amendment, they must not travel in a Government-owned automobile from their place of work to their homes, or from their homes to their place of work; and, in the first place, they can not get to their work. The Bureau of Roads officials say they sometimes send men out who travel 300 and 400 miles a day on inspection work. How can they get home except in their Federal car? In an effort to strike at joy riding in the city of Washington, where a taxicab can be hired for a reasonable sum to travel 1, 2, 3, and 4 miles, you are ham-stringing these services in the Rocky Mountain region and in the plains region, for which hundreds of millions of dollars are appropriated. It is a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Boulder Canyon project: For the continuation of construction of the Hoover Dam and incidental works in the main stream of the Colorado River at Black Canyon, to create a storage reservoir, and of a complete plant and incidental structures suitable for the fullest economic development of electrical energy from the water discharged from such reservoir; to acquire by proceedings in eminent domain or otherwise, all lands, rights of way, and other property necessary for such purposes; and for incidental operations, as authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act, approved December 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V., title 43, ch. 12A); $8,000,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until advanced to the Colorado River Dam fund, which amount shall be available for personal services in the District of Columbia and for all other objects of expenditure that are specified for projects included in this act under the caption "Bureau of Reclamation" without regard to the limitations of amounts therein set forth.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARENTZ: Page 22, line 15, after the words set forth in lines 15, insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, That not to exceed $45,000 shall be available for the erection, operation, and maintenance of necessary school buildings and appurtenances on the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, and for the purchase and repair of required desks, furnishings, and other suitable facilities; for payment of compensation to teachers and other employees necessary for the efficient conduct and operation of schools on said reservation."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I know that if the gentleman from Wisconsin could view the development of this great work and the conditions existing at Boulder City, he would withdraw any objection, and I know the gentleman will by the time I get through speaking. I say this advisedly, because the gentleman from Wisconsin is fair-minded. He does not want to see school children located 25 miles from the nearest school traveling in busses to school, back and forth each day, five days a week, when the Federal Government has created a reservation for the care of the workmen that are carrying on this great project, a project which is now under construction. There are 500 families, approximately, in the environs of this reservation, and the number of school children varies from 146 to 250. These children at the present time have no place to go to school.

The State of Nevada can not tax the personal property in this reservation so they can erect a school, yet we have the incongruity of the Secretary of the Interior, who goes about this country talking about the need of education, who believes thoroughly in providing every need for proper school facilities, being faced with the proposition of not being able to provide such facilities here where they are so badly needed. He is trying to direct this city in the way a Government city and an American city should be directed, and yet, although he believes in schools, he can not do anything toward the construction of a school unless we put legislation in this bill providing for the construction of such a school; and I say that unless this legislation goes in the bill we will have these children traveling 25 or 50 miles a day back and forth to the nearest school, and the State and county, the local people, being unable to provide a school here at Boulder City even though they desire to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes; gladly.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the alibi that the Secretary of the Interior has, if the gentleman knows, for refusing school facilities in this Government-owned city?

Mr. ARENTZ. To get the correct picture the gentleman will have to go back to last September, when members of the Appropriations Committee of the House, including the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] and others, were standing there looking over the city, at that time just a sand heap. Buildings were being erected here, there, and everywhere, and I said, "Where is your school building?" I said this in the presence of the Appropriations Committee and in the presence of the chief engineer, Mr. Walter, Commissioner Mead, and Secretary of the Interior Wilbur. He said, "We will provide the school buildings." Our Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Wilbur, got in touch at once, apparently, with the Comptroller General, who ruled that he could not spend a dollar unless he got authorization for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the Secretary of the Interior is sympathetic to having a school building there?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes; the Secretary is most decidedly so. The Secretary of the Interior sent his representative down here, and his representative made a statement before the Committee on Appropriations and told them all that I am trying to tell you now; but the Appropriations Committee has tried to do everything it can to bring about economy, although in this case they said they thought the Secretary of the Interior should go ahead and build the building, but the Secretary is not going to take that responsibility without authority.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask this further question——

Mr. ARENTZ. He is in favor of it, of course.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Congress here and now should put aside the legislative rules of the House and authorize this expenditure, what assurance have we that the denizens of that city will not call upon Congress next year for a larger amount or a further amount for maintenance?

Mr. ARENTZ. I hope, my friends, that within the next month a bill which I have prepared and introduced, providing for the taxing of the personal property in this reservation by the State of Nevada, will pass; and if it does, the State of Nevada, through the proper authorities of Clark County, Nev., will at no cost to the Government provide all facilities.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not curious to have the gentleman's explanation of contingencies of that character. I would like to know definitely, if this appropriation is authorized, what assurance will the gentleman give that he will not come to Congress next year for a larger appropriation?

Mr. ARENTZ. We are facing a condition now where the little children have no school and we can not get away from that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly answer the question I have twice propounded?

Mr. ARENTZ. What is the question?

Mr. STAFFORD. What assurance will the Congress or the members of the committee have, in case this authorization is permitted, that the gentleman will not come here next year for a larger appropriation for the same purpose?

Mr. ARENTZ. Looking up in my face right now is the gentleman who holds in his hand the power to say whether or not this authority shall be given to-day and whether any further authority shall be given.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman still does not answer my question.

Mr. ARENTZ. So far as I am concerned, I say I shall not ask for anything more.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is sufficient. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ARENTZ. And let me say further, Mr. Chairman, that the construction of this Boulder Canyon Dam is going on at such a rapid pace I fear that the $8,000,000 appropriated in this bill is not going to be nearly enough.

I can do nothing to add to the appropriation. For instance, the officials of the Reclamation Service figured that it would take two years to build 6,400 feet of the 54-feet-in-diameter diversion tunnels. These tunnels are 1,600 feet long, and it was thought it would take at least two years to finish them. I want to say that the work started a year ago in March, and the tunnels will soon be completed and lined with two feet of reinforced concrete, and before the summer is over the entire flow of the Colorado River will pass through those tunnels, and they will begin to construct the coffer-dams and make excavations in the canyon bottom to bed rock.

Eight million dollars is not going to be enough. We must not do anything that will prevent the carrying on of this great and mighty work with the greatest dispatch, for speed means safety to those in the great Imperial Valley and the saving of large sums to the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, this subcommittee visited the Boulder Canyon project last summer. The thermometer there at that time was 126 down at the dam. It was amazing to us to see quite a number of children there, and I understand there are now about 200, with no school facilities. If we do not make this appropriation, they will have to continue to go to Las Vegas, some 30 miles distant, to school. We did feel that they should have these school facilities. When the gentleman from Nevada said that he would take the necessary funds for a suitable school building and furnishings out of the $165,000,000 that we have authorized and out of the $8,000,000 immediately available now, I felt that we should approve of it, and all the members of the committee do approve of it.

The only question is I doubt whether the gentleman's language is sufficiently clear. I want the language of his amendment to have this specific clause in it: "Provided, That the funds for this school shall be taken out of this $8,000,000 fund," so it will be clear that it is to come out of this appropriation. With that modification the committee has no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk insert those words and modify the amendment to that extent. Insert the words "Provided, That of this fund not to exceed $45,000," and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 72, line 15, after the words "set forth," insert the following: "Provided, That of this fund not to exceed $45,000 shall be available for the erection, operation, and maintenance of necessary school buildings and appurtenances on the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, and for the purchase and repair of required desks, furnishings, and other suitable facilities; for payment of compensation to teachers and other employees necessary for the efficient conduct and operation of schools on said reservation."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. With that modification the committee has no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada, as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read down to and including line 14, page 73.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'CONNOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8397) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES AS CITIZENS

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by publishing a speech I made last night at Howard University.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me at Howard University, February 8, 1932:

Mr. Chairman and my fellow Americans, I say fellow Americans to remind you of the fact that you are American citizens and entitled to all the rights and privileges that every other citizen enjoys—the right to vote and be voted for as a candidate for any office in the gift of the people.

We will never enjoy our constitutional rights in this country until we combine our forces and support those men for public office who are willing to enact such laws as will enforce the Constitution and all amendments thereto.

By our loyalty and devotion we are entitled to our rights under the Constitution. This comes to us as a sacred heritage, bought through loyalty and sacrifice beginning with the heroic Crispus Attucks, who fell on Boston Common, and continuing through to Flanders Field on a European battle ground, all of which participation, through the ages, has demonstrated that we are willing and brave enough to lay down our lives for our country.

Crispus Attucks was among the first to sacrifice his life in the interest of the American Colonies. Before we were a United States of America he fertilized the soil of this land with his lifeblood dedicated to liberty and freedom.

During the activities of the Continental Army, negroes to the number of about 3,000 enlisted to fight to preserve the Colonies and to make it possible to form these United States, when the motto was "All for one and one for all."

During the War of 1812, our second engagement with England, with Jackson at New Orleans and with Perry at Lake Erie, negro soldiers made the great contribution to the war strength of our Army.

The war drums sounded long and loud in '61 as we pushed our way into the Civil War. Negroes, 200,000 strong, joined the irrepressible conflict and took part in some of the most notable battles of that war. They are remembered well at Fort Wagner and at Pillow; they marched with Sherman from Atlanta to the sea; they participated in other engagements too numerous to mention.

Again the people are called to arms. Spectacular and exciting were the days of President McKinley and the Spanish-American War, which brought out the soldier, Theodore Roosevelt, with his celebrated Rough Riders, and who met strong resistance by the soldiery in the Spanish blockhouses. It remained for the negro troops to save the day, not only for the United States but for the intrepid Roosevelt himself. These colored soldiers marched on the Spanish blockhouses singing "There'll be a hot time in the old town to-night."

The famous Tenth Cavalry, along with the Ninth and the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, became a part of the fighting forces of our country by act of Congress in 1866. The Tenth Cavalry was one of the regiments that took part in the assault upon the Spanish blockhouses at San Juan Hill.

During the great World War the men of my race enlisted, 380,000 strong, to fight for world democracy, and we are now praying, longing, and hoping for the day to come when of a truth we will have democracy in every State of the Union and whereby every American citizen 21 years of age can cast his ballot any place in America and that ballot be counted as cast. Until that time comes, this will not be the true democracy about which we so much proclaim.

We have earned our rights in this country, under the Stars and Stripes, by the loyal support and devotion we have given, and while we are not satisfied with present conditions in and around our country, where we are denied our constitutional rights and the use of the ballot, free and untrammeled, nevertheless America is our home; our parents were born in this country, and here we must fight out our destiny. We of this generation were born here, and our children were born here. It is the only country we know; the only home we have. We shall continue to contend for both our civil and political rights—the full privilege of the ballot.

With all the wrongs imposed upon us and all the injustice visited upon us, we are still American citizens and propose always to be loyal to the Government which is ours, and we will maintain, unsullied, the reputation and fact that none of our group has ever conspired against this Government or joined any movement calculated to attempt the destruction of our institutions or aid any alien propaganda in this land of the free and home of the brave.

But with all that we have done we wonder if we are properly appreciated. When we see orders issued by the War Department modifying the regular soldierly routine of the Tenth Cavalry, relieving them of all commanding officers, taking away their side arms and assigning them around to different Army posts to do orderly work, which is nothing but servant work, we wonder if the department has the proper respect and appreciation of the valor of these negro troops and their importance at this particular time.

From a communication I received from the War Department it is claimed this is necessary under the plan to reduce certain branches of the services in favor of an increase of the Air Corps of the country. That may all be correct, but if we are going to numerically reduce the Infantry and Cavalry service, why not give us an opportunity to join the Air Corps service and let black soldiers learn to fly and be of extended service like all other American fighting units so we will be able to render our Government better service in the future and be equal to any other American soldier.

It seems to be the policy of the Government to demote the negro troops in the fighting units and establish and make of them labor battalions. That is most discouraging, un-American, and not giving us that square deal every American is entitled to receive.

I want to read for you a table showing you the enlisted strength of the Army of the United States, the reduced numerical strength of negro troops, their utter absence from the Air Corps service, and see if we have had fair treatment:

Enlisted strength of the United States Army, June 30, 1931

Quartermaster Corps	7,444
Medical Department	6,612
Finance Department	369
Corps of Engineers	4,326
Ordnance Department	2,179
Signal Corps	2,575
Chemical Warfare Service	451
Cavalry	7,692
Field Artillery	14,815
Coast Artillery Corps	12,711
Infantry	40,569
Air Corps	13,194
Detached list	6,073
Retired (on active duty)	24
Total	119,034

Colored units

Ninth Cavalry	523
Tenth Cavalry	475
Second Squadron	307
Machine-gun Troop	128
Twenty-fourth Infantry	722
Twenty-fifth Infantry	437
First Battalion	237
Third Battalion	244
Total	3,073

Though 10 per cent of the population, negro troops are only 2.5 plus per cent of the Army. They are 18 plus per cent of the Cavalry and 4 plus per cent of the Infantry, with none in the Air Corps.

Since our people not only from a military standpoint but during the long 250 years of slavery hewed the wood and tilled the soil to make America what it is, I plead with all Americans to help my racial group to secure their rights under the Constitution.

The enactment of laws will not secure our rights without a healthy public sentiment back of it. I am appealing to those of the religious world, interested interracial groups in America, Representatives in Congress and in the Senate, men of the press, magazine editors, and all to help create such a public sentiment that America will be what it claims to be—the melting pot of the world, where each man shall have his full rights under an orderly government of free men and women.

I am also appealing to the lawmakers of the country, municipal, State, and national, to enact such laws as will benefit all Americans, thereby creating such a healthy respect for law and order that no community will feel it necessary to try to take the law in their own hands and commit the crime of joining a mob and resort to lynching and burning, for such lynchings and burnings create a disrespect of law and order and break down the morale of the community where such things occur.

I am going to prophesy the time will come in America when every law-abiding citizen and every God-fearing man will stand up and support America, for we are going to save America for Americans.

There are forces at work in our communities now trying to spread a doctrine of disrespect of law and order and teaching insurrection, which is un-American, unsuited to our form of government. They are preaching and agitating the people to a degree bordering on revolution and trying to convince the people with their unbelief in the Almighty. They are organizing against the religious forces of the world. I contend that no force can stand on this earth, in these days of enlightenment, that is set against the teachings of Jesus Christ.

As the only negro Representative in Congress, I especially appeal to you to so shape and guide yourselves that by your conduct and education you will understand our rights in America; that this may be brought about under the guidance of the best American citizens, white and black, so that right and not might shall prevail.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic committee on committees, and acting within the scope of the authority conferred upon them to fill committee vacancies, I present a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 137

Resolved, That JOHN J. MCSWAIN, of South Carolina, be, and he is hereby, elected chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERMISSION FOR THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO SIT DURING THE SESSION OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the chairman and of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask unanimous consent that that committee be allowed to sit during the session of the House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ANNUAL REPORT, ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN (H. DOC. NO. 25)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of section 6 of the trading with the enemy act, I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the Alien Property Custodian on proceedings had under the trading with the enemy act for the year ended December 31, 1931.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION AND THE FARMER

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, unless the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is administered much better than it is worded it will become the most outrageous legislative tragedy ever perpetrated since the beginning of time.

Briefly, let us see what is about to be reconstructed and what is about to be destroyed by this much-boasted reconstruction process. Let us see who are to become the cannon fodder for this mighty engine of death for some and more tremendous power for others. Let us see who are to suffer and die by the thousands in order that the corporate, monopolistic interests of the Nation, which have bled the common people white, may carry forward their diabolical scheme of complete centralization of both financial and political power. I call on a fair and impartial public to watch the administration of this act and determine whether or not it is administered so as to reconstruct and reestablish the average citizen or is administered solely and only in the interest of the very powers that are now destroying the citizenry of our Nation. Let us see if this enormous fund is not loaned to the more powerful corporations to enable them to destroy the very people whom we are sent here to represent and with them destroy their opportunities as free men. Let us see if this fund in $100,000,000 blocks is not loaned to the more powerful corporations in a way that enables them not only to crush out the very lifeblood of the common people but to crush out, pulverize, and swallow the smaller corporations in competition with these favored monopolies. Let us keep our eyes wide open and look and listen and determine whether or not tremendous loans are not made to the larger railroad systems of the country, for alleged euphonious reasons, but in effect turning loose and making available for the particular railroad company $100,000,000 more to be invested in busses and bus transportation generally throughout the Nation, in competition with and to the destruction of the smaller railroad lines. Let us see if this is not the beginning of a railroad-merger program, a short-line railroad dismantling and junking orgy, and a transportation monopolistic control of busses and railroads such as was not dreamed of heretofore.

Let us see if this so-called reconstruction program does not mean the building up of the big railroads by the destruction of the smaller ones, the building up and reconstruction of the big financial institutions of the money centers to the ruin and destruction of the banks of the smaller cities and the country, and the reconstruction of the most powerful and dangerous monopolies to the destruction of the smaller corporations and citizens generally. To my mind—and time will tell whether or not I am right—this is the same kind of reconstruction for the powerful monopolies that comes to the whale by eating the smaller fish and that comes to the lion by devouring the lamb.

Mr. Speaker, agriculture is suffering more than ever before. The farmer is being destroyed. His Government is not giving him a square deal. He is being robbed and he and his family are being murdered by his own Nation. Yet, this so-called Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure, in making a feeble effort to offer an excuse for its existence, says it is to "aid in financing agriculture"—agriculture that is flat on its back, helpless and dying. To aid in finishing agriculture would have been more indicative of the real purposes of the bill.

Oh, but it is argued that this bill provides for loans to the farmers for production purposes, and therefore it is a farmers' bill and not solely and only a corporation bill. Let's see about that. The sponsors of the bill wanted to authorize loans of as much as $200,000,000 to each corporation, but some of us opposed this in every way possible until we finally got this limit reduced to $100,000,000. But, even at this, this tremendous amount under the terms of the bill can be loaned, with the sky the limit in so far as legislative regulations are concerned, provided it is loaned to a corporation and in no event to an individual. But let us see about the amount that is to be loaned to the farmers. Mind you, this is not loaned to the farmers direct from the corporation, but must be handled through the Secretary of Agriculture under regulations promulgated by him. These regulations have been issued and furnish data for a complete comparison of the purposes of this bill as applied to the big corporations and to the farmers of the country.

To begin with, the amount to be loaned to all the farmers is only $50,000,000, or only one-half of what can be loaned to one corporation and only one-fourth of what the sponsors of this bill wanted loaned to one corporation. Even if the bill be so construed as to increase the amount to be loaned all the farmers to $200,000,000, then all the farmers of the whole Nation, with all their property, can only borrow the amount the sponsors of this bill wanted loaned to only one corporation. But this is not the worst. Let's see what we have. Loans of $100,000,000 to corporations with the sky the limit are to be freely made of the people's money. I repeat, loans of fabulous amounts are to be made of the farmers' money and of the average citizen's money to the big corporations without any limit of specific statutory regulations, and yet, when this same money is to be grudgingly loaned to the farmers of the Nation, they are to be hedged about by the most unfair, outrageous list of regulations ever set up for any free people of modern times and equaled only by the most rigid orders ever issued to slaves by the taskmasters of the past.

The original act is bad enough. These regulations make it infinitely worse. The act authorizes these loans for production purposes generally. These regulations attempt to repeal or amend the act of Congress by saying that this money shall be used only for the purchase of "seed, fertilizer, feed for work stock, and fuel and oil for tractors used in crop production and spraying materials," and only to those "who are without means to purchase these supplies."

Mind you, the farmer can not use any of this money to buy food for himself and family even though he uses his children to do the work on the farm. He can feed his mule out of this money but not his sick child to help nurse him back to health to be further enslaved on the farm. The old man who is unable to work and the poor widow with her family of children who are too small to work can not use a penny of this money to hire help. If the farmer's plow is broken or his plow lines come to pieces, he can not buy more with this money.

At this time I shall not mention all of these unusual, unnecessary, and totally unfair regulations, but shall call attention to a few more of the most vicious. Listen to this one:

> Loans will not be made for the purchase or repair of tools and machinery, purchase of livestock, or the feeding of livestock other than work stock used in crop production.

If the farmer's mule dies, he must quit his crop unless some one else loans him money or a mule.

If some poor widow whose sons died fighting for their country borrows some of this money, she can not use any of it to hire help, and under penalty of violating a contract with her Government she must be careful that not a penny of the fund is used to help keep alive her only cow that furnishes milk for this poor woman and hungry children.

Remember, this is all under the same law that provides for loans of $100,000,000 to each corporation with no legislative restrictions whatever.

Here is another of these regulations:

> No loan will be made to any applicant who did not operate a farm in 1931.

This means that a man who was too sick to operate a farm last year can not do so this year with this help. A man who had a job last year and has lost it and thinks he may be able to rent a little piece of land or buy a piece and make enough to ward off starvation can not get any help. He must simply starve unless he gets his job back. He can not even hire to another farmer if this money or any part of it is to be used to pay for his labor.

Here is one more of these vicious regulations. It is the most far-reaching and dangerous provision of all, and is the one which brands this list of regulations as the most dangerous ever promulgated. Listen to it:

> No loan will be made to any individual or to the tenants or share croppers of any landlord to finance or assist in financing the planting of an acreage of cotton or tobacco in excess of 65 per cent of the acreage of such crops planted by such individual or by the tenants or share croppers of such landlord in the spring of 1931, and unless such individual or landlord agrees that he will not have any interest whatsoever in any such crops in excess of 65 per cent of the acreage of such crops to which he had an interest in 1931: Provided, That the foregoing shall not apply to the farmer, tenant, or share cropper who in 1931 planted not more than 10 acres of cotton or 3 acres of tobacco.

This provision can only mean slavery for the man who has to borrow money from his government. It means that the poor farmer will be forced to curtail his crop so that the man who does not have to borrow can increase his. It does not at all mean a proper reduction of acreage. The farmer who plants the small acreage does not hurt the market near as much as the man who plants the large acreage and who does not have to borrow money from the Government. If this reduction of acreage is forced by the Government against the poor fellow who borrows these funds, the corporations which can get money from this Reconstruction Finance Corporation can plant without limit and the big man who needs no money from the Government will plant without limit. The result is that there will be as large a crop as ever, and the poor man will be the slave under this regulation, and he will do all the suffering with all the benefits going to others.

I hope and plead with the Secretary of Agriculture to change these regulations at once, and when this money is loaned to these farmers let them have it as free men and not as slaves.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1530. By Mr. AYRES: Petition of Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wellington, Kans., opposing any modification or resubmission of the prohibition law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1531. By Mr. BARBOUR: Petition of citizens and various churches of the seventh congressional district of California, relating to the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1532. By Mr. BLOOM: Petition of the Federation of Jewish Women's Organizations (Inc.), of Greater New York, urging the adjustment of the immigration laws so that lawfully married couples—one party an American citizen and the other a foreigner—be permitted entry into the United States on the nonquota basis; and, further, where one party of a marriage contracted in the United States is not naturalized, that he or she be permitted to remain in the United States as noncitizen, but be expected to become naturalized at the earliest possible date; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

1533. Also, petition of National Association of Letter Carriers, vigorously opposing proposed legislation to reduce postal and Federal salaries, for the reason that the general policy of maintaining wages in every industry, so far as possible, is a sound one and the Government should not abandon that policy and give its tremendous moral support to wage cutting; postal and Federal salaries have never been raised as much in relation to the cost of living as have wages generally, and their purchasing power is still inadequate; the problem of the Government Budget is only slightly affected by the postal deficit, and if it is desired to remove this deficit, other means are available than cutting wages; even a general cut in salaries of Federal civilian employees would be of negligible help in balancing the Budget; the proper rôle of government during a depression is not to contract expenditures but to expand them; to the Committee on the Civil Service.

1534. By Mr. BOILEAU: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Waupaca, Wis., opposing resubmission of the eighteenth amendment and urging adequate appropriations for law enforcement and for education in law observance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1535. By Mr. CANNON: Petition of Gussie R. Carroll and other citizens of Clarksville, Mo., opposing resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution to the States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1536. By Mr. CLAGUE: Petition of J. M. Palmer, of Blue Earth, Minn., and 40 others, protesting against any measure for modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal of the prohibition laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1537. Also, petition of Agnes Conrad, Blue Earth, Minn., and 46 others, protesting against any measure for modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal of the prohibition laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1538. Also, petition of Anna Kelsey, president Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Blue Earth, Minn., and 58 others, protesting against any measure for modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal of the prohibition law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1539. Also, petition of Florence Fitch and 37 others, of Blue Earth, Minn., protesting against any measure for modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal of the prohibition law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1540. By Mr. CLARKE of New York: Petition of 40 members of the Reformed Methodist Church of Endicott and Rev. Harold Rambo, pastor, and 75 members of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, Endicott, N. Y., opposing modification, resubmission, or repeal of the eighteenth amendment and prohibition laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1541. Also, petition of Rev. D. W. Lyman, pastor, and 550 members of the First Baptist Church of Endicott, and Rev. John G. Frey, pastor, and 987 members of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Endicott, N. Y., opposing modification, resubmission, or repeal of the eighteenth amendment and prohibition laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1542. Also, petition of 36 members of the Free Methodist Church of Endicott and Mrs. F. L. Rogers, president Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Endicott, N. Y., opposing modification, resubmission, or repeal of the eighteenth amendment and prohibition laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1543. Also, petition of Anna B. Lattin and 40 residents of Cooperstown, and Mrs. C. L. Herrick and 62 residents of Worcester, N. Y., opposing modification, resubmission, or repeal of the eighteenth amendment and prohibition laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1545. By Mr. CULKIN: Petition of Dan Horrington and sundry other citizens in the vicinity of the city of Oswego, N. Y., protesting against the enactment of Senate bill 1202, providing for the compulsory closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

1546. Also, petition of L. D. Sheldon and sundry other citizens of Copenhagen, N. Y., protesting against any measure looking toward the modification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1547. By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of the board of directors of the Associate Hotel Operators, urging modification or revision of the prohibition laws of the United States, feeling that such modification will operate to the particular advantage of the hotels and allied activities, as well as accrue to the general advantage and advancement of the welfare and interest of the whole Nation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1548. Also, petition of the Federation of Jewish Women's Organizations (Inc.) of Greater New York, petitioning the Government so as to adjust the immigration laws that lawfully married couples—one party an American citizen and the other a foreigner—be permitted entry into the United States on the nonquota basis, and, where one party of a marriage contracted in the United States is not naturalized, that he or she be permitted to remain in the United States as a noncitizen, but be expected to become naturalized at the earliest possible date; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a statement, in the nature of a petition, signed by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and Frank Morrison, its secretary, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR'S APPEAL FOR ECONOMIC AND LEGISLATIVE RELIEF

A real national emergency has been reached. It calls for profound consideration and the application of practical remedies. The destructive consequences of widespread, continuous, distressing unemployment have reached an acute stage. Relief of a most definite and adequate nature must be supplied in order to relieve hunger, distress, and human suffering. The economic causes responsible for the creation of this situation have been operating for several years. As a result industry is to a great extent paralyzed. The financial structure of the Nation is greatly impaired, credit facilities have become inadequate, confidence has been destroyed, and a state of mind bordering on hysteria prevails throughout the land. The great working population of the Nation and those dependent upon them have suffered most of all. Financial losses and impairment in credit values ahe not as disastrous in effect as the losses which millions of working men and women have sustained as a result of unemployment. Life and living, in the fullest sense of these terms, depend absolutely upon the exercise of the right to work and upon the enjoyment of the opportunity to earn an income required to maintain a decent American standard of living.

Because the representatives of organized labor are thoroughly conscious of the acute suffering and distress which prevails in all communities, we have assembled in Washington, the Capital City of the Nation. The gravity of the situation made such a deep impression upon the executive council and the national and international representatives of international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor that they deemed it imperative to meet, consider the emergency which has arisen, and give expression to the demands of the unemployed, numbering more than 8,000,000, that work opportunity be created and that relief so urgently needed be immediately supplied.

We meet, therefore, as representatives of labor, clothed with authority to speak for many millions of organized workers affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and to speak for other voiceless workers who, because of their disorganized state, have no medium of expression. The workers who have suffered much and who have endured hardships and distress for several years have exhausted their savings, have reached the limit of their resources, and are facing the future with impaired morale and physical deterioration.

Many members of organized labor who are working have been and are contributing a large percentage of their earnings to assist their fellow workers who are unemployed. Others are sharing the very limited amount of work available. In these ways many millions of dollars have been contributed by the members of organized labor toward helping their associate fellow workers who have been unemployed during the last two years. They will continue to render all assistance possible and to do all that lies within their power to relieve human distress and intense suffering. But the need is too great. The number of unemployed is constantly increasing. More than 8,300,000 were suffering from enforced idleness during the month of January. Local relief agencies have found the task too great. Adequate relief can not be and is not being supplied. Men, women, and children are hungry, cold, and undernourished. They are appealing for food, warmth, and shelter. The tragic feature of this uncivilized, inhuman condition is reflected in the fact that millions of children are suffering from hunger and cold every day and that many thousands are unable to attend school because of a lack of food, clothing, and shoes.

The entire resources of the Nation must be brought into action and must be utilized in order to meet and deal adequately with this emergency. The local communities, the States, and the Nation must all do their part, responding in full measure to the demands of the occasion. It does not seem reasonable for the Federal Government to deny relief to men, women, and children suffering from unemployment when it is clearly evident that local and State relief agencies are unable to meet the requirements of the situation. Those who are hungry and are appealing for food can not draw the fine line of distinction between relief supplied by local and State relief agencies and relief supplied by the Federal Government. They know that every community is a part of our national life, and as such all are a part of the Nation's family. The indistinct lines which separate communities and States are not discernible in the midst of nation-wide misery and woe.

This fact was recognized during the great war emergency, and it should be recognized during the existing emergency. It is upon this basis that we appeal to the Congress of the United States for an immediate appropriation of an adequate sum sufficient to meet the demands of the existing economic situation. We make this appeal in the name and in behalf of the hungry, suffering men, women, and children whose plight is directly traceable to unemployment. We urge the enactment of the Costigan-La Follette bill appropriating $375,000,000 for relief purposes immediately and for such other appropriations as circumstances and occasions may require.

The masses of the people will feel that Congress has utterly failed to measure up to its duties and responsibilities if, while in session as it now is, during a period of great national emergency it fails to appropriate funds to supply food, clothing, and shelter to millions of suffering, starving people. The billions of dollars which Congress has provided for the purpose of aiding banks, corporations, and business institutions will stand out in sharp, deprecating contrast if Congress fails to promptly help the needy and the hungry. The huge sums thus appropriated to aid capital can not and will not feed and clothe hungry people. Surely Congress can not afford to subject itself to the charge that it speedily appropriated billions for capital and nothing for the hungry. Human values and human needs should be given first rather than secondary consideration.

No explanation can be made to hungry people and their sympathetic friends which would satisfy them as to why Congress voted billions to aid banks and corporations and would refuse to appropriate even a moderate sum to be used for the purpose of assisting the States and communities in supplying food, shelter, and clothing to patriotic, loyal citizens who are suffering from unemployment. We do not consider the appropriation of Federal relief to supply food, clothing, and shelter in this great emergency to millions of starving men, women, and children as a dole.

The local relief agencies in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, and Detroit have found the task too great. For instance, in New York 250,000 families are in immediate need of relief, while 100,000 are receiving assistance. In Philadelphia the number dependent on relief has risen from 3,000 in December, 1930, to 43,000 in December, 1931. Philadelphia estimates its need at $6,000,000 beyond that raised, and there is no more money in sight. Funds raised from private sources will be exhausted by May 1. In Chicago relief funds will be exhausted by the 15th of February. Eviction cases in that city average 250 per day. In Cleveland the local relief funds are practically exhausted, while the need for help has substantially increased.

While the larger cities are overwhelmed with the problem of meeting minimum relief requirements and have funds raised for that specific purpose there are millions living in isolated towns and villages remotely situated from the larger cities who have no organized relief agencies to assist them. Only about 40,000,000 persons, or 32 per cent of our population, live within reach of relief organizations such as community chests. Sixty-eight per cent live in small towns or country districts where no organized relief agencies exist with the exception of the county poor boards.

There are some 60,000,000 persons residing outside the zones where relief agencies exist. The vast majority of them are working people. Many of those living in these isolated sections reside in mining districts, oil-field communities, textile-mill villages, and other small villages where the banks have failed, where small industries have collapsed, and where the need for help is intense.

A significant development of the very serious situation which exists is clearly evident in the larger cities where large crowds of unemployed accumulate, where protest meetings are held, in the hunger marches which have been and are taking place, in the violence which occurs, in crime and in the accumulating wave of discontent and social unrest which is sweeping over the country.

Therefore we, the representatives of labor, fully informed of these deplorable conditions, receiving reports from our personal representatives who are in these sections and having first-hand information with reference to the economic and social needs of working people, appeal for help and assistance for them as well as for those who live in the larger cities.

The plight of these millions of people is shocking. It is steadily and rapidly growing worse; and unless some drastic means are taken to alleviate the situation, the Nation will suffer heavily in the destruction of physical, moral, and mental values. It is our solemn judgment that the time has arrived when the Congress of the United States should arise to the occasion, respond to the appeals of the hungry, assist in feeding men, women, and children during this great emergency, just as our Nation did when the cry for help came from starving people across the sea.

The heart yearnings and unquenchable desires of the workers are reflected in the appeal of the masses of the people for the exercise of the right to work. They prefer work and the enjoyment of opportunities to earn a living to relief supplied from any source or sources whatsoever. Employment and the development of opportunities to secure work are of more importance to them than the appropriation of relief.

Working people are thinking in more advanced terms. They no longer concede to industry the right to provide work at will or to force millions of people into unemployment. They hold that the right to work is a fundamentally sacred right and propose to fight earnestly for the universal acceptance of this humane principle. Instead of forcing working people into idleness during periods of economic recession, labor demands that such adjustment in the number of days worked per week and the number of hours worked per day must take place so that all may share equitably in the amount of work available. Work security must be substituted for anxiety and unemployment. The management of industry, which has failed so miserably during this long-continued period of unemployment, must rise to new heights and assume new positions. They must realize that industry has an obligation to working people equal if not greater than it owes to itself.

A balanced system based upon intelligent planning, operating in such a way as to provide employment security, must be substituted for the unscientific and uneconomic methods now being pursued by industrial management. But this plan and this policy must be considered in relation to permanent relief policies. The needs of the moment and the urgency of the existing situation press for immediate solution and action.

We reiterate the demands of labor for the application of constructive work remedies and policies in order to extend and broaden work opportunities for millions who are idle. We propose:

1. The immediate establishment of the 5-day work week in both private and public industry.

2. A cessation of the wage-cutting policy which was relentlessly pursued during the year 1931, and which has resulted in a destruction of mass buying power and the creation of fear and distrust in the minds of millions of working men and women. The soundness of this position is quickly recognized when we consider the fact that the wage losses of wage earners, with a corresponding reduction in buying power, amounted to $11,000,000,000 for the year 1931 as compared with the year 1929.

3. To create work opportunities by every business executive employing at least one more employee and by industrial enterprises adding to their working force in proportion to the number now employed. Every professional person and heads of households extending employment or part-time employment to as many people as possible. Every community to undertake to develop and carry on additional work.

4. All efforts possible be made to keep boys and girls in school and that local post-graduate opportunities be provided for those finishing school.

The organized-labor movement, through the American Federation of Labor, will cooperate in full measure with other organizations in carrying forward a nation-wide campaign for the realization of these objectives. We have joined with other groups in the realization of this praiseworthy purpose. We shall continue to give all the support possible to nation-wide organized movements formed for the purpose of creating work opportunities and of stimulating industrial activity.

We specifically recommend that the Federal Government take immediate steps to establish the 5-day work week for Government employees. Such action on the part of the National Government would very greatly influence the management and owners of private industry. We are certain that the time has arrived when this action should be taken, for we are confident that the establishment of the 5-day work week will become universal within the very near future. Furthermore, we protest against any reduction in the salaries and wages of Government employees. As representatives of labor, we feel fully justified in assuming this strong position, both from an economic and moral point of view. The Government, a large employer of labor, should set an example by maintaining wage standards commensurate with the requirements of American citizenship. The Government, representing all the people, can not afford to join with those who are determined to lower the American standard of living through forced reductions in income, with a corresponding loss in morale and personal efficiency. The Government would lose more than it would gain through such action. The maintenance of wage standards on the part of the Federal Government will serve in a most valuable way to protect and preserve corresponding standards established by millions of working men and women employed in private industry.

The importance of the legislative demands of organized labor runs parallel with that of the unemployment situation. In behalf of unnumbered millions of American working men and women we solemnly petition Congress to grant the needed legislative relief which is so earnestly sought. For years the minds of American working people have been filled with a keen sense of injustice because corporations have resorted to the wrongful use of injunctions in labor controversies. American working people, as the people of no other nation, have suffered mentally and materially through what they firmly believe was the unjust application of the injunctive process. The right to organize and to function is devoid of meaning if, through the use of the writ of injunction, men and women are prohibited from organizing for mutual helpfulness and from exercising their economic strength and from appealing to other workers to join with them in a common cause. Men and women smart under a keen sense of injustice when they become the victims of sweeping, prohibitive injunction orders and contempt proceedings.

Public opinion slowly responded to the constant appeals of organized labor for the enactment of injunction-relief legislation. It began to understand that labor was fully justified in the protests it made against the abuse of the writ of injunction in labor controversies. As a result the two great political parties included in their platforms a pledge both specific and implied to support injunction-relief legislation which, in effect, would free labor from the unjust restraints which had been placed upon it.

Now, without further delay, labor feels justified in calling upon the Members of Congress to redeem their party pledges, to show good faith through the enactment of injunction-relief legislation at this session of Congress.

The American Federation of Labor is supporting an injunction-relief measure introduced by Senator NORRIS and designated Senate bill No. 935. The same measure has been introduced in the House of Representatives. In appealing for the enactment of this character of legislation, labor is not asking for a privileged status. We are not seeking to exempt labor from the provisions of any law. We are asking that labor be given an equal status with other citizens and that the restraining power of the Government shall apply to labor only as it applies to other groups of American citizenship.

We have waited long and patiently for Congress to act favorably upon the injunction-relief legislation which we have sponsored. We are certain that in its present form, as reported to the Senate by the majority members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, it provides the minimum of relief which should be accorded us and that any impairment in its provisions will be considered by labor as a failure on the part of Congress to redeem in full measure the political pledges made by both political parties.

Labor regards the injunction-relief measure as of transcendent legislative importance. It is one legislative measure in which we are inexpressibly interested. We firmly believe and expect that this measure will be favorably acted upon during the present session of Congress. It is our purpose and our fixed determination to exercise the right of appeal guaranteed to all American citizens by calling upon the Members of Congress to give individual and collective support to labor's injunction-relief measure.

Therefore, in this conference, composed of the representatives of national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and representing directly more than 3,000,000 and indirectly additional millions of working people, we voice our earnest plea to the Members of Congress to redeem party pledges, to give labor the relief which it honorably seeks, to complete a noble task through the enactment of injunction relief bills S. 935 and H. R. 8088 as speedily as possible and at an early date.

We wish to stress our interest in legislation providing for a 5-day work week for Government employees, the legislative proposal providing for Federal aid to States adopting old-age pension legislation, the King bill (S. 7) to deport certain alien seamen, for the payment of the prevailing rate of wages by all contractors engaged in Government work, for the development of a public-works program which will serve to prevent a recurrence of unemployment widespread and distressing as it now exists, the Davis-Kelly bill which provides for the regulation and control of the demoralized coal industry, for the protection of the oil industry, for the modification of the Volstead Act so as to provide for the manufacture of 2.75 per cent alcoholic content beer, for the enactment of taxation legislation providing for an increase in the higher income-tax brackets, more exacting inheritance-tax provisions, and for the enactment of legislation supported and sponsored by organizations representing Government employees.

For the purpose of presenting this appeal of organized labor for economic and legislative relief to the Chief Executive of the United States and to the Members of Congress we, the representatives of millions of working men and women, as herein referred to, recommend that the executive council and all national and international representatives of organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in attendance at this conference call upon the President of the United States, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and present to each of them the recommendations and sincere request of this conference as herein expressed.

In submitting this appeal to the Chief Executive of the Nation and to the Members of the Senate, through its Presiding Officer, and to Members of the House of Representatives, through its Speaker, we hope and trust that the seriousness of the unemployment situation, the justice of our appeal for the enactment of remedial legislation, and the constructive suggestions which we have offered will command their official and personal support.

By direction of the conference of national and international representatives and the executive council of the American Federation of Labor.

WM. GREEN, President.
FRANK MORRISON, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Reserve Officers' Association, Department of Delaware, opposing any further reduction of personnel or appropriations for the Army and Navy, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of religious, civic, and educational organizations of Far Rockaway, Inwood, Lawrence, Cedarhurst, Woodmere, and Hewlett, Long Island, N. Y., favoring disarmament and world peace, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Bronx County, N. Y., remonstrating against the proposal to reduce the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented a resolution adopted by officers and members of the Bayside Low Land Civic Association, of Bayside, Long Island, N. Y., protesting against the proposal to reduce the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a letter from W. W. Moore, of Houston, Tex., with an accompanying petition in the form of a resolution, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIDELITY TRUST CO.,
Houston, Tex., January 26, 1932.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As our senior Senator from Texas, we are sending you an original petition addressed to the Senators and Representatives of our State signed by Hon. R. S. Sterling, State capitol, Austin, Tex.; Judge Lewis Fisher, State National Bank Building, Houston, Tex.; E. H. Buckner, Petroleum Building Houston, Tex.; Mrs. Sarah Campbell Blaffer, 6 Sunset Boulevard, Houston, Tex.; J. S. Cullinan, Petroleum Building, Houston, Tex.; Mrs. Henry B. Fall, 107 Sul Ross, Houston, Tex.; W. W. Moore, Petroleum Building, Houston, Tex.; Allen V. Peden, the Houston Gargoyle, Houston, Tex.

Copy of this petition is being mailed to Senator CONNALLY and to Congressmen GARNER, BLANTON, BRIGGS, BUCHANAN, CROSS, DIES, GARRETT, JOHNSON, JONES, KLEBERG, LANHAM, MANSFIELD, PATMAN, REYBURN, SANDERS, SUMNERS, THOMASON, and WILLIAMS.

We invite the careful consideration of all, followed by customary formal action.

Respectfully yours,

W. W. MOORE.

JANUARY 20, 1932.

To the SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES OF THE STATE OF TEXAS,
Washington, D. C.

As citizens of the State of Texas who for many months have been subjected to financial conditions that have grown increasingly intolerable, we hereby petition for relief.

Whereas Article I, section 8, of the Federal Constitution reads:

"The Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures"—

thus lodging sole responsibility for the creation and value of money in the Congress;

Whereas a recently prepared chart issued by the National Industrial Conference Board covering the 50-year period from 1880 to 1930 shows the following:

	1880	1930	Ratio between beginning and end of period
1. Population	50,000,000	123,000,000	+2.4
2. National wealth	$43,000,000,000	$361,800,000,000	+8.4
3. National income	$7,500,000,000	$34,000,000,000	+11.2
4. Bank deposits	$2,134,000,000	$55,289,000,000	+25.9
5. Monetary gold stock	$350,000,000	$4,535,000,000	+12.9
6. Money in circulation	$960,000,000	$4,522,000,000	+4.7
7. Per capita money in circulation	$0.00	$6.71	+1.8
8. Cost of government	[1] $850,000,000	$12,609,000,000	+14.8

[1] 1890.

Your particular attention is directed to the amazing expansion of bank deposits (25.9), reflecting chiefly corporate or individual indebtedness calling for interest payment to the banks out of all proportion to the increase in population (2.4) or money (1.8);

Whereas money is not only the measure of value and medium of exchange but under our banking laws is the basis for credit and for credit expansion, hence it should have a proportionate relation to national wealth, national income, as well as to advanced type of civilization, standards of living, and high wage policy of our society;

Whereas human history should teach us that, having adopted such advanced standards, we can not safely scrap the conveniences, comforts, and ideals such imply without grave risk of chaos or revolution;

Whereas as a result of the unwarranted postwar inflation and wild speculation collapsing in 1929, the shrinkage in the value of securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange in the 26 months preceding December 1, 1931, amounted to $62,912,000,000; authorities estimate the shrinkage in other forms of wealth to be double that amount, making the startling total of around 50 per cent contraction from the $361,800,000,000 reported as our national wealth in 1929;

Whereas, as is well known, the drastic policy applied to the contraction of credit has enormously increased unemployment, resulting in widespread disaster to corporations and severe hardships to the individual and the family;

Whereas the deflation policy, coupled with efforts to maintain a liquid position in a falling market, adopted by our financial institutions now threaten the solvency not only of corporations and individuals but municipalities and other governmental subdivisions;

Whereas, ignoring what European countries or other nationals may or may not do in regard to the payment of reparations, the payment of national, corporate, or individual debts, or in making changes to improve their national economic and financial conditions:

We, as citizens of the United States, respectfully demand that the Congress either—

First. Substantially increase the volume of money by restoring silver, by asset currency, or by such other form as will adequately meet the pressing and urgent needs of the existing financial situation; or,

Second. Declare a national moratorium for a 5-year period, dating from January 1, 1932, during which period all obligations in the form of bonds, notes, or other forms of indebtedness contracted prior to January 1, 1932, may, at the option of the debtor, be deferred in whole or in part without being subject to legal demand for the payment of principal or interest.

To the end that—

Third. The dollar will be reduced to its normal purchasing value.

Fourth. Our National and State banks be relieved of the pressure that now applies as a result of previous inflation for which they, acting under the authority of our banking laws, were measurably, if not solely, responsible for creating and thus allow such banks to dispose of frozen assets in an orderly manner while meantime consistently performing the service for which they were incorporated.

Fifth. Our gold standard may be maintained and fiat currency of any kind avoided.

Sixth. Current activities in production, manufacture, and distribution of commodities and employment of labor to meet the needs and desires of our people may be resumed and continued.

Seventh. All citizens afforded equal opportunity to help themselves rather than forced to seek help from charity, from government, a dole, or otherwise.

Eighth. The interests of the Government of the United States of America and the welfare of its people may receive your exclusive attention until the essential requirements to offset the world's economic and financial crisis have been fully met.

STANDARD GRADES FOR COTTONSEED

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a letter in the nature of a petition from Chester H. Gray, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 9, 1932.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: I note that you have introduced an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill providing for the establishment of mandatory standard grades for cottonseed, and the supervision thereof under the grain standard act.

I wish to take this opportunity to indorse this proposal and to express the hope that it may receive the approval of Congress. Back as early as 1923 the American Farm Bureau Federation adopted the following resolution at its annual convention:

"We favor the further study and development of grades of agricultural commodities, the improvement of present grades, and promulgation of laws, rules, and regulations as rapidly as feasible."

Acting pursuant to the authority contained in this resolution, the American Farm Bureau Federation supported during the Seventy-first Congress a bill (H. R. 12011) sponsored by Representative JONES, of Texas, providing for the establishment of standard grades for cottonseed.

An important feature of your amendment is that it makes mandatory the use of the standard grades that are established, and provides for their supervision. This is particularly important in preventing dishonest dealers from taking advantage of honest dealers, which might result if the use of the grades were not mandatory on all dealers. It also affords added protection to the farmers.

We believe that your amendment will help to eliminate some of the undesirable practices in the purchase of cottonseed, and we hope that it will receive the approval of Congress.

Respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN GOODS

Mr. KEAN presented a letter from E. W. Wollmuth, executive vice president of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Newark, N. J., with an inclosed newspaper article, which, with the accompanying matter, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE CITY OF NEWARK, N. J.,
February 2, 1932.

Hon. HAMILTON F. KEAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The matter of increasing importations of foreign goods at decreasing prices is giving concern, as evidenced by the attached article from the Newark Sunday Call, January 31.

We believe that the matter is of such importance that you may want to bring it to the attention of Congress and have it extended into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very truly yours,

E. W. WOLLMUTH,
Executive Vice President.

[From the Newark (N. J.) Sunday Call, January 31, 1932]

FOREIGN GOODS DUMPING HURTS NEWARK TRADE—CHAMBER OF COMMERCE SURVEY SHOWS HOW TARIFF IS EVADED—QUICK ACTION URGED

"Dumping of foreign goods into the Newark market is seriously affecting the city's industry and increasing unemployment."

That summarizes a survey, nearing completion, by the Newark Chamber of Commerce, under the direction of its executive secretary, Edmund W. Wollmuth, of the extent to which foreign importations have affected domestic industry.

Some industrial concerns of Newark received a severe jolt in the course of the survey. Many admitted they had been caught napping, and others were astounded by the situation revealed. All agreed some action should be taken to cope with the menace.

Mr. Wollmuth and Charles J. Fagg, the chamber manager, who aided him in making the survey, base their findings on facts, figures, and charts submitted by leading industrialists.

Outstanding among the disclosures are the fraudulent practices of importers. It was found that to avoid the tariff, certain articles are camouflaged by cheap covers and entered as leather goods. Camille L. Gairoad, general manager of J. Wiss & Sons, cutlery manufacturers, asserted that millions of pairs of scissors are being so entered.

TARIFF LOOPHOLES USED

"It is impossible for domestic manufacturers to compete against such a terrific handicap," he said. "Importers are doing their utmost to detect loopholes in our tariff laws to dump foreign goods here and disrupt home markets. I know that German-made shears can not be purchased in Germany as cheaply as German-made shears are bought here. That places the American manufacturer at a disadvantage at the outset and will continue to do so as long as foreign goods are entered into this country on the ad valorem instead of on the specific tariff basis."

Reports received by Mr. Wollmuth from some of the biggest coal and coke operators in the United States—located in or near Newark—indicate they are suffering from the increase in foreign importations of those products. The extent to which the industry has been affected is outlined in the following statement:

"Recent growth of the importation of foreign fuels has had the effect of demoralizing the domestic bituminous coal market, causing operators to lower prices to a point where the industry is receiving inadequate returns to provide protection to labor and capital. Three million people are directly dependent upon the industry. Transportation systems of this country are being seriously affected by the decline in coal shipments. Coal constitutes the largest single item of railroad traffic and produces the greatest amount of shipping revenue. The effect of the decline of bituminous coal shipments because of foreign importations is evidenced by the amount of coal handling equipment not being used and the large number of railroad men idle. This situation creates a social disruption and the necessity for protection against future decline in both employment and demand.

FOREIGN OIL DISPLACES COAL

"Foreign fuel oil displaced 17,000,000 tons of bituminous coal in this section in a year. From this sale of imported oil equivalent to 250,000 tons of bituminous coal in 1924, the annual imports have increased to more than sixty-eight times that quantity. The most serious effect of this displacement of coal by oil is upon labor, especially in the bituminous-mining industry and in railroad transportation. The loss to coal operators by the importation of foreign oil amounts to $28,900,000 a year. The loss to railroad labor is even more serious.

"In the last year approximately 700,000 tons of foreign anthracite coal have been dumped into North Atlantic ports. This coal came from Russia, Germany, and England. In addition, these countries have recently entered about 100,000 tons of coke and briquettes. For every ton of coke imported 1½ tons of American bituminous coal is displaced. The drop in the English exchange, due to eliminating the gold standard, is largely responsible for this situation. Remedial and emergency legislation should be enacted which should be in the form of a higher import duty on foreign fuel oil, coal, coke, and briquettes. From the figures quoted it is obvious that the earnings of the coal-carrying roads, already seriously cut, will be further reduced.

"The Interstate Commerce Commission has recently allowed the railroads an increase of 6 cents a ton on all coal and coke transported in order to increase their earnings. This places an added burden on the coal and coke producer and favors the foreign importers.

THOUSANDS DEPRIVED OF WORK

"Loss of coal tonnage has deprived thousands of railroad and mining employees of work and has seriously affected other industries. This condition has contributed greatly to unemployment and depression in the United States and no compensation has been accorded domestic industry. Newark labor has also been victim of this situation."

The survey also produced evidence that foreign manufacturers frequently issue two sets of bills on shipments to this country, one for purposes of duty and another, entirely different, for the American purchaser.

Lumber, the principal commodity handled at Port Newark, is beginning to feel the effect of foreign competition. Col. Charles E. Long, manager of the eastern division of the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., said that shipments of Russian spruce have recently been unloaded at the port and sold under domestic prices.

"The labor situation in the United States lumber industry is none too good, but it will be far worse if foreign lumber continues to be dumped into our ports," he explained.

Newark manufacture of bathroom fixtures is practically at a standstill. John H. Balmer, president of the J. H. Balmer Co., stated that importers who know nothing about the line pick up foreign fixtures and dump them into this country at prices lower than they can be manufactured here.

POTTERY PLANTS IDLE

"There are nine potterers in New Jersey whose plants are adapted especially for the manufacture of our needs, but any one of them can now take care of all the fixture business in this State," Mr. Balmer asserted. "Most of them had to lay off all but a few men; some of them closed down entirely and others are seeking different lines to which they might adapt their machinery. The situation will require more than a higher tariff schedule to remedy it."

Remedial measures will come, Mr. Wollmuth said, but it is the policy of the chamber of commerce not to propose them because they might be construed as of a political character. He cited methods employed by other nations to prevent dumping of merchandise into their ports.

"Canada," said Mr. Wollmuth, "has a strict set of antidumping regulations. No goods can be unloaded at Canadian ports at prices lower than those current at the point of origin of the merchandise to be unloaded. This has set up a strong protective wall about the Dominion's products, safeguarded its labor interests, and fostered the growth of home industries.

"In Australia the Government fixes the quotas on foreign imports, giving preference at all times to British products. The same practice prevails in France, and a notice was received yesterday that France has suspended all imports of radios, accessories, and parts (except tubes) until further notice. The notice further announced that the United States quota for importing radio tubes to France for the first three months of 1932 is exhausted and that no further imports will be admitted before April 1. Exception is made, however, on all shipments of radios, tubes, parts, and accessories shipped from this country before January 27, accompanied by through bills of lading dated prior to that date, or which were in the French customs warehouses before that date."

MORE UNDERSELLING

Newark's business in electric bulbs, in the manufacture of which this city was second to none in this country, has fallen off greatly, the survey shows. Foreign bulbs are being shipped here in increasing quantities, at prices far lower than the domestic product. Tables compiled by Mr. Fagg indicate a steady increase in quantity of imported bulbs, but an equally steady decrease in the prices at which they are sold here. This not only affects the domestic makers of the glass bulbs, but also the manufactures of the wire for filaments, the production of both of which is now but a small percentage of the former volume.

The survey by the Newark group will soon be completed. Reports from local industrialists to the chamber of commerce are increasing daily in number, each setting forth the damaging effects of low-priced, inferior foreign goods, and the inadequacy of domestic tariff provisions. The complete survey will be submitted to the National Legislature, Mr. Wollmuth stated, with the view of effecting relief for the industries of Newark and other manufacturing centers in the United States. Leaders in domestic industry have conferred with the chamber's executives, offering every facility for presenting a true picture of the present unemployment situation.

THE GOLD STANDARD

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask that excerpts from an article by Hartley Withers in the Spectator, a London Conservative daily, and reprinted in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Excerpts from an article by Hartley Withers in the Spectator, of November 8, 1931]

ENGLISH WRITER ATTACKS GOLD STANDARD AS OBSOLETE METHOD OF GAGING WEALTH—LONDON SPECTATOR CONTRIBUTOR SEEKS TO SHOW CHIEF ARGUMENTS FOR MONETARY SYSTEM ARE ERRONEOUS—OFF THE GOLD STANDARD

(Reprinted from the Living Age)

We read almost daily warnings from the financial writers of the danger of what is called "the flight from the pound." Direful pictures are painted of the ruin and havoc that will occur to the whole of our population if the pound ceases to be equivalent in exchange value to 113 grains of gold. Never was greater nonsense written.

The periods of this country's greatest industrial prosperity—measured by its output of goods—have been those periods when the pound was cheap; and the periods of our greatest industrial depression and social misery have been those during which the pound has been the dearest.

What is it that gives value to money and to credit? It is certainly not a paltry few millions of pounds of gold held in bank vaults. To-day we are all using the promissory notes of the Bank of England, against which there is not sufficient gold to redeem more than a small proportion. But this redemption is not legally obligatory on the part of the bank—except in special cases and only for amounts equivalent to 400 ounces of gold and over. The value of money is created entirely by the public and by the government when they accept it in exchange for goods and services. No one, except those engaged in international exchange, stops to think of the basis of the currency. The one and only question that arises is, "Will this money be acceptable to those whom I wish to purchase goods from and pay my bills to?"

John Stuart Mill announced three-quarters of a century ago that if every golden sovereign was replaced by a 1-pound note and the gold withdrawn entirely, each note would have precisely the same value as the golden pound. We have innumerable instances of this. During the war the Bank of Sweden refused to exchange its notes for gold. Gold was at a discount with paper. And to-day the value of gold is purely artificial, and is due to the legal-tender laws enacted by this and other countries since the war. And if the governments of Europe and of America were to do with gold what they did with silver half a century ago, gold would fall in value just as silver has done.

A COMMODITY LIKE OTHERS

Gold is a commodity like all others, and is affected by supply and demand. It is not owing to the demand in the arts that gold retains its high value. There is enough uncoined gold held in bank vaults to last the arts for the next 50 years. What would the value of cotton or wool or copper be if it were known that there was enough of these commodities held in storage to satisfy the industrial demand for the next half century?

Again, it is claimed by the advocates of the gold standard that the yellow metal furnishes a stable measure of value. How much longer will the public allow themselves to be deceived by such a baseless claim? We have only to go back to the war period and compare our treasury-note system, unbacked by gold, with the dollar of the United States, where nearly one-half of the gold supplies of the world were collected.

The only correct method of estimating the fluctuations in money is by means of index numbers. I quote the following from the speech of Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank, delivered on January 27, 1925. After mentioning the variations of the pound sterling with the dollar during the war, he says: "In 1922 the mean deviation from the British average (index number) was 2.87 and from the American 6.34. * * * If we take the whole period, 1922 to 1924, the respective mean deviations were 4.30 and 4.90.

"Thus, on the basis of the official index numbers, the price level in England has been more stable during the last three years than in the United States. Measured by the standard of purchasing power, the pound, which is not on the gold standard and has no regular restriction on its issue, has maintained stability better than the dollar, which is based on gold."

HOW FINANCIERS ENRICH SELVES

Moreover, the value of gold can be seriously affected merely by its removal from circulation. Its use as the basis of currency provides a means by which financiers can enrich themselves to an almost unlimited extent. The bankers' magazine some years ago gave an illustration of this. It related how a certain American syndicate during a period of three weeks withdrew £11,000,000 in gold from the Bank of England and shipped it to New York. Before doing this they sold British securities heavily and bought American securities.

The withdrawal of this gold caused a fall in the prices of 325 of our leading securities of £115,500,000, while the expansion of credit in America, due to this additional gold, led to an advance in American securities to a similar extent. As a financial writer said at that time, "These speculators were playing upon two tables—one in London and the other in New York—at the same time, and winning on both without any risk of losing. They were gambling on a certainty!" Similar operations have taken place since this, and are in fact being continually practiced but without the same publicity.

There is not one scientific reason for employing gold as a basis for currency at the present time.

"New times demand new measures and new men;
The world advances, and in time outgrows
The laws that in our fathers' days were best;
And doubtless, after us, some purer scheme
Will be shaped out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth."

LACK OF BANKING SYSTEM

What is the real position of this country in regard to its obligations? By the adoption of the gold standard the coalition government and its successors placed us at the mercy of that nation that was able to control most of the gold supplies of the world. Our keenest industrial rival in the world's markets managed to secure one-half of the available gold, and consequently, since we are now a debtor nation, we have become to a large extent subservient to our trans-Atlantic neighbor. Consequently we must make such terms with our principal creditor as she demands.

Fortunately, the resources of Great Britain with her overseas Dominions would enable us to discharge our liabilities if we had a truly national banking system. The annual gold productions of South Africa and Australia (to which may be added Canada) would—under a league of British nations—furnish all the gold necessary for meeting our foreign obligations. Unfortunately, we have no such system. We have no national bank in the sense of a government bank functioning entirely in the service of British interests. On the contrary, the Bank of England is an international trading company, and is permitted to carry on its business as its directors deem most advantageous to themselves and their shareholders.

We now learn that the crisis that has given us a new government was precipitated through the policy of the bank in making long-time loans to Germany during her recent troubles. This necessitated borrowing from France and the United States—which loans were made for short periods. The publication of the economy committee's report, which was one of the most indiscreet acts on the part of the late government, created a feeling of uneasiness abroad and led to the calling in of loans and the reduction of the bank's gold reserves to the extent of about £35,000,000 within a week or so.

But think of a government's placing the whole of the national credit, together with the trade, commerce, and industries of this great nation, upon a basis of borrowed gold, which could be taken from us at any time! A more dangerous or more insane policy it would be difficult to imagine.

WHY POLICY IS FAVORED

It may be asked why the bankers of this country have adopted a policy that can end only in ruin. The reply is that they are merely continuing a policy that has been in existence for considerably more than a century, and that, whenever a crisis has arisen in their affairs, the Government has always obliged them by coming to their rescue and supporting their institutions with the national credit. Moreover, the gold-basis policy has been enormously profitable to the city of London. Owing to the insufficiency in the gold supplies and to the volume of legal tender based upon it, the bankers have created a substitute in the form of bank credit, which has no material existence. It consists of figures in the banks' books. But this invisible money, which exists only in the books of the banks, is loaned and draws interest charges precisely the same as if it had a material existence in the form of golden coins.

During the war period the amount of this bank currency was increased to the extent of £1,000,000,000! Is it any wonder that the system is attractive to those who deal in money?

LIKE BLOOD IN BODY

Money is the greatest power that man has yet created. It functions as the lifeblood of all nations, and, like the blood in the human body, it should have freedom to circulate. Interference in any channel may produce congestion, paralysis, and even death. It is a social instrument, and it is society that gives it its power. No individual or syndicate is responsible for the value or power of money. It is the creation of law, and obedience to law forms the basis of civilization.

In his Modern Democracies, published in 1921, the late Lord Bryce said: "Democracy has no more persistent or insidious foe than the money power, to which it may say, as Dante said when he reached in his journey through hell the dwelling of the God of Riches, 'Here we find Wealth, the great enemy.' That enemy is formidable because he works secretly, by persuasion or deceit rather than by force and so takes men unawares. He is a danger to good government everywhere." He continued as follows: "The truth seems to be that democracy has only one marked advantage over other governments in defending itself against the submarine warfare that wealth can wage, namely, publicity and the force of public opinion. So long as ministers can be interrogated in an assembly, so long as the press is free to call attention to alleged scandals and require explanations from persons suspected of an improper use of money or an improper submission to its influences, so long will the people be at least warned of the dangers that threaten them. If they refused to take the warning they are already untrue to the duties that freedom prescribes."

But what is to happen when these safeguards of publicity are taken under the control of the money power? And this is precisely what is happening. Never since the beginning of time has mankind been in greater danger of losing its freedom than now.

The inventions and discoveries of the past century—and particularly of the last 50 years—which it was believed would raise civilization to a far higher level than ever previously reached, may yet be employed in degrading and enslaving humanity, and some of us may live to see the beginning of another thousand-year night after the break-up of the British Empire—like that which followed the downfall of Rome!

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BRATTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2655) providing for waiver of prosecution by indictment in certain criminal proceedings, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 201) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2914) to authorize appropriations to pay in part the liability of the United States to the Indian pueblos herein named, under the terms of the act of June 7, 1924, and the liability of the United States to non-Indian claimants on Indian pueblo grants whose claims, extinguished under the act of June 7, 1924, have been found by the Pueblo Lands Board to have been claims in good faith; to authorize the expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior of the sums herein authorized and of sums heretofore appropriated, in conformity with the act of June 7, 1924, for the purchase of needed lands and water rights and the creation of other permanent economic improvements as contemplated by said act; to direct the issuance of a patent to the Pueblo of Taos for certain lands described herein, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 202) thereon.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1470) providing a nautical school at the port of New Orleans, La., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 203) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1096. An act for the relief of N. D'A. Drake (Rept. No. 204); and

S. 2375. An act for the relief of Roscoe Meadows (Rept. No. 205).

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2062) for the relief of Adam Augustus Shafer, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 206) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2058. An act for the relief of William C. Rives (Rept. No. 207);

S. 2059. An act for the relief of Albert Ross (Rept. No. 208); and

S. 2060. An act for the relief of Otto Schluter (Rept. No. 209).

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 466) for the relief of the Allegheny Forging Co., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 210) thereon.

Mr. METCALF, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 432. An act granting permission to Harold I. June to transfer to the Fleet Reserve of the United States Navy (Rept. No. 211); and

S. 2242. An act granting six months' pay to Louis Soluri (Rept. No. 212).

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which were referred the following bill and joint resolution, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1153. An act to provide for the incorporation of credit unions within the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 214); and

S. J. Res. 4. Joint resolution to provide for the naming of Montgomery Blair Circle (Rept. No. 213).

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1003) for the relief of Capt. Jacob M. Pearce, United States Marine Corps, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 215) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1009) for the relief of George Edwin Godwin, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 216) thereon.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2200) to authorize the presentation of a medal of honor, posthumously, to the late Henry Clay Drexler, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 217) thereon.

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2982. An act for the relief of J. G. Seupelt (Rept. No. 218);

H. R. 4145. An act for the relief of Thomas C. LaForge (Rept. No. 219); and

H. R. 4150. An act authorizing issuance of patents in fee to Benjamin Spottedhorse and Horse Spottedhorse for certain lands (Rept. No. 220).

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1839) to authorize the creation of Indian trust estates, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 221) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3409) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and affiliated bands, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 222) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRATTON:

A bill (S. 3590) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of settlers on railroad lands," approved June 22, 1874; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. McGILL:

A bill (S. 3591) to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 3592) confirming the claim of Francis R. Sanchez, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3593) granting an increase of pension to Barbara A. Chamberlain (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 3594) to reduce construction charges on certain lands within the Newlands irrigation project, Nevada; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

A bill (S. 3595) authorizing Ralph F. Wood, lieutenant commander, United States Navy, to accept the decoration of an Italian brevet of military pilot honoris causa tendered to him by the Italian Government; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 3596) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell or dispose of certain surplus real estate of the War Department; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 3597) granting an increase of pension to Arpa Montgomery (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAYDEN:

A bill (S. 3598) for the relief of Jessie Blout; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BULKLEY:

A bill (S. 3599) for the relief of sundry building and loan associations; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3600) granting relief to Clarence Loveberry; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 3601) for the relief of Thomas T. Gessler; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 3602) authorizing the modification of a certain contract for the sale and purchase of the St. Johns Bluff Military Reservation, in Florida; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 99) authorizing an appropriation to defray the expenses of participation by the United States Government in the Second Polar Year program, August 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. LEWIS submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. WAGNER submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RAILWAY MERGERS

Mr. DILL submitted a resolution (S. Res. 164), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed—

1. Forthwith to transmit to the Senate a full and complete transcript of the testimony taken in Commission Docket 12964, Consolidation of Railroads Into a Limited Number of Systems, on January 6, 7, 8, and 9, 1932;

2. As promptly as practicable, to transmit to the Senate a full and complete statement and analysis of all holdings of stock and bonds in any railroad or holding company affected by or interested in the so-called 4-system plan for the eastern region, dated October 1, 1931, now under consideration by said commission, to the extent that such holdings of stock or bonds are by or on behalf of any railroad corporation, holding company, or trustee affected by or interested in said 4-system plan, such statement and analysis to include the number of shares of stock, with their par value, and the par value of all bonds, together with their original cost per share or per $100 of par value of bonds, and their total cost, and also to include their present worth at the market prices current at the latest available date;

3. As promptly as possible, to transmit to the Senate balance sheets of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the Pennsylvania Co., the Pennroad Corporation, the Alleghany Corporation, the Chesapeake Corporation, the Van Sweringen Corporation, the Virginia Transportation Corporation, the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., and the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., as of the latest date available, showing in detail all the holdings of said corporations in other corporations, with the amounts at which each and every of said holdings are carried on the books of said corporations and their value at current market prices; and

4. As promptly as possible, to transmit to the Senate a detailed statement of all moneys obtained by any railroad corporation or other corporations herein referred to by the sale or hypothecation of any stock, bonds, or equipment obligations at any time within the six years that ended with December 31, 1931.

"AMERICA AND THE FAR EAST"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEWIS

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] a short time ago made a very interesting speech in the National Radio Forum on the subject of "America and the Far East." I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESS OF HON. J. HAMILTON LEWIS, OF ILLINOIS, WASHINGTON, D. C., FEBRUARY 1, 1932

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I beg to thank my friend, Mr. Kuhn, for his flattering reference to me. As one of my friends, he finds it agreeable to be generous to an extent quite beyond my dues. I thank the committee of Senators who presented me as a spokesman for the occasion.

I have been asked to speak to you on the subject of the present complications in Asia, I assume because it is known that I spent some time in the Orient, first following the war between Russia and Japan and later upon other matters that threw me in touch with the particular territory that is now both under discussion and assault.

When I was in Manchuria I had to observe that which all would have discovered—that the railroad was built as a main line of communication to connect Moscow, Russia, with Peking, China. It was equally plain that the road was the one source for the distribution for war material and was created as a military agency.

Let it be understood that the controversy of Japan for the railroad and that of China for the possession of its neighboring land, Manchuria, now of Chinese occupation, as well as the claim of Russia for the road, as asserted from Moscow, has for its object the possession of China and adjacent territory. With this consummated, there will be a continuous control from Japan to the border of Siberia. This connection between Japan and Siberia will leave Japan as the master director in the affairs of Asia. This is the ultimate object and apparently the prime purpose of Japan.

You will observe that the scheme to pacify and supervise all Asia is a natural one on the part of Japan. It is one that could have been expected, particularly by the United States of America. And it should have been anticipated when one considers the history of the immediate past and prospect of the present. Japan patterns after a policy and action of the United States. We will not forget that we took such course in behalf of our own United States to pacify North America when we entered Cuba, then Mexico, and later the Central American countries. Let us recall that the United States of America assumes to maintain the Monroe doctrine, and under it protect the destinies of Central and South America, so as to assure these lands against dominion of any European government.

Here we pause to make the parallel and to note openly and without reserve that which is the apparent truth. Japan is preparing an Asiatic Monroe doctrine. The example of the United States is before Japan, and with this lesson Japan proceeds in the pursuit of her policy at a time when China is in distraction. She takes possession and control both of the territory and directs the privileges of all Asia. This is following the course Japan took when she centered upon and appropriated Korea. The movement is upon the assumed right of Japan of forcing peace and preserving Asia for the Asiatics, as we hope to preserve America on the American continent for the Americans. While this movement on the part of Japan is to conquer China and to put it under the sovereignty of Japan in her control of Asia, it lessens to a great degree the opportunity of America to trade on equal terms with Japan or with the countries of the world in Asia.

From this result there arises before us a much more serious phase than the loss of trade. I hesitate to pronounce an alarm to my countrymen, but I must not withhold from the reflection of our citizens the threatening destiny. And here, in the words of a watcher at the approaching specter in "Hamlet," "I will cross it though it blast me." Reflect that Russia has grievances against America for disrupting the commercial treaties between America and her country. She continues her grievances against the administration of Taft, Wilson, and Hoover for refusing to recognize the Bolshevik administration. And with this she carries a further resentment for our holding up the present Russia to the world as unworthy of equality with the Republic of the United States. For all these irritants Russia carries secretly her curved sword in its restless scabbard.

The countries of Japan, China, and Russia—they remind us that the United States has excluded their people from residency or citizenship. They turn scornfully to us to assert that however justifiable such policy of exclusion could have been before the World War, on the theory of the right of each nation to hold aloof its people from any other nation, yet these Asiatic countries of Japan and China invite attention of the world to the fact that in the World War conflict the United States accepted them as allies in the partnership with America, France, and England.

Japan now insists in diplomatic contention that this contractual relationship in the war changed the situation between the governments as it had existed in the past. She claims that as we in America reserved the right now to keep out the Asiatic people, including Russia, from all America, she (Japan), as the guardian of Russia, under the Asiatic Monroe doctrine, reserves the right to protect Asia from any possession of enjoyment or of any privilege in Asia by the Americans.

Here we have again the beginning of the old issue of Asiatic safety—the east against the west. Our history records how often this particular contest, controversy, and rivalry has been played upon the stage of creation, and we will not forget to summon in the name of Christianity the memory that this moved as far west until it reached Tours in France, and there driven back by the forces of Christianity, led by a Russian and a Prussian general. These two were guided by the great Pole, whose masterful judgment and superior tactics commanded the zone and saved the situation.

Now, with this phase such as I have remarked upon as it exists to-day in Asia, with its threat to the United States, let it be expected that soon America will confront a union of Japan and Russia. This will confront the United States with a defiance, and at such hour, my fellow countrymen, we will be fortunate if, under the guise of some alleged offense by the United States, Russia will not be incited by influences to seize Alaska, her former possession, now disclosed as rich in all resources. At the same time of this invasion Japan will move to take the Philippines for all their uses. This move, as will be observed surely by all military tacticians, would divide the American defenses thousands of miles apart, and in these distractions bring us to a point of danger where it is assumed by the Asiatic master that to avoid the results of a conflict between ourselves and the now combined Asia the United States would yield to a new proposed relationship, accepting an international equality with the new alliance of Asia.

Here is where I tender my opposition to the disarmament meet now under way at Geneva. In this aspect of the eastern world as I have described it and of the world as we know it, I am forced to say that to me any effort to lessen the national defense of our country, or to weaken its power to defend itself against the combination which now threatens, is a serious error filled with tragedy. Asia now notes the temper of Europe toward the United States as lately expressed in many forms and many aspects touching the matter of the foreign loans and the efforts of our land to collect them. Asia consoles herself in the security of thought that not one European nation can be brought to our aid in the hour of our peril. I must insist that in such surroundings from the world, for us at any point and in any assembly to demand of any world nation that it should limit its armaments below that which each feels is its necessity, is to give these world nations the reciprocity right to demand the limitation of the arms of defense of America, and thus cut from us the necessary capacity in both quantity and quality of that which would repel any assault which they or their Asiatic allies contemplate making against us.

It has, to my thinking, become a sad hour when two classes of our citizenry have divided themselves one against the other. First is one who repels any expenditure in behalf of our national defense and its preparation merely because it takes some of our taxable possessions in order to pay for the defense. Others sincerely feel that the very possession upon our part of the capacity to defend our Nation against an advance is an affront to other nations and invites them to assail us because we have prepared to meet such assault. Between these two well-meaning and, let us believe, well-intending people our Nation has been brought to a condition where none can say what is our capacity for national defense at this time, and more regretfully we have divided that spirit of patriotism in our country where one side feels that it is to commit an offense against society and religion to demand preparation for national defense, while another assumes that they are regarded as outlaws against humanity if they merely protest against other nations having the right to direct the course of the life and death of this our Republic—to direct her life in order to compass her national death.

Let America look up and look out. The hour calls upon us to be on guard and for our citizens to be watchful. Let us all know that we are living in a new era and that the order of action fitted for yesterday, in the days of friendship and international good will, was one thing, while the rules for the new order that has wedged itself between America and the world, leaving us in our defense standing alone, is wholly a different thing. We hope for the new day—that new era making for friendship from all Asia and Europe. We dream of the hour when in ourselves will be the love for all mankind, but until this Heaven's grant is realized America has from her people but one order: It is vigilance by her citizens, guardianship by her Nation, and a just preparation and continuous strength that shall preserve the United States as the true Republic of honor and freedom under God—the pride of her children and the glory of the world! I thank you.

ARTICLE ENTITLED "'RESCUED GERMANY' REPLIES"

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, some time ago I gained consent to insert in the RECORD an article by Garet Garrett on "The Rescue of Germany." I hold in my hand an interesting reply entitled "'Rescued Germany' Replies." I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Monthly for January, 1932]

"RESCUED GERMANY" REPLIES

Garet Garrett's article in the Saturday Evening Post of September 26, 1931, entitled "The Rescue of Germany," bears the stamp of propaganda work which in its one-sided distortion of facts and events can hardly be surpassed and vividly recalls French pamphlets published during the war and at the time of the occupation of the Ruhr district. The object of the article is to demonstrate that Germany, acting as a dissembling and cunning sinner, contrived to deceive her unwitting creditors, and not only attempted to evade her obligations but to lead a life of luxury, and to strengthen her economic and social institutions at the expense of her creditors.

In his undisguised animosity, the author shrinks neither from depicting Germany as a fraudulent bankrupt without adducing even the shadow of a proof, nor from casting suspicion upon the representatives of many nations. These representatives, more fully realizing the trend of events, were willing to extend a helping hand in time to protect their own countries against more disastrous consequences, accusing them, aided by the evil debtor Germany, of leading on the creditors—first of all, the American, English, and French claimants—to ever-growing sacrifices.

Garrett says:

"Almost daily the governor of the Bank of England had New York on the telephone to tell American bankers how desperate the situation in Germany was, how it grew worse from day to day, and why the United States should proceed to take measures on a large scale. If the governor of the Bank of England did not call up New York, the British Government called Washington to convey there the same information."

Guided by such views, Garrett overlooked, contrary to his better knowledge and judgment, taking into consideration that the events which have led to a consolidation of the nations with respect to world economics, have brought about a condition where the welfare of each nation is dependent upon that of another. Also, the world economy, in view of the structure it has assumed since the war and of the rapidly developing depression prevalent during the past months, can not afford to look on inactively while important links are suffering and languishing. America and England are merely acting as prudent merchants and far-seeing bankers. We may well assume that romantic conceptions are, indeed, foreign to them.

Garrett charges in the main that Germany, with malice aforethought, has evaded her obligations as a debtor. He claims that Germany never paid reparations, but always employed foreign credits for the purpose. He completely conceals the fact that even prior to the time when the Dawes plan went into effect, i. e., before the flow of foreign credits inaugurated by the Dawes plan set in, Germany had already paid reparations which, according to the Reparation Commission's own figures, amounted at the end of 1922 to 7.9 billion reichsmarks, according to the estimate of the American Institute of Economics to 25.8 billions, and according to German calculations to 41.6 billion reichsmarks. After 1923 and until the Dawes plan became effective additional 1.7 billion gold marks were paid. Garrett further declares:

"Germany's first reparation payments were made by those foreigners who during the inflation period placed confidence in the reichsmark, or speculated in it. As in the case of every speculation, losses were incurred by foreigners, for which, however, they were compensated by the acquirement of German values by means of German paper marks."

Moreover, Garrett overlooks that during Germany's inflation period she was repeatedly compelled to part with values on reparation account which partly represented payments in actual gold and partly in gold marks. In 1922 every 10 days a payment in exchange of 31,000,000 gold marks was made. After the Dawes plan and the Young plan went into effect Germany truly endeavored, voluntarily and completely, to fulfill the obligations assumed. The total amount of these payments and the extent of the sacrifices made are apparent from calculations showing that Germany's payments to the victorious nations, and other absorptions of capital, were estimated to equal half of Germany's national wealth prior to the war.

The realization which is gaining ground that Germany, in the long run, will be able to pay only with the proceeds from her economy, but not out of her capital—that is to say, within the limits of her economic capacity only—led to the Dawes committee being instructed to find ways and means for an adjustment of the Budget of the National Commonwealth. In addition, the committee was to consider measures for the stabilization of the German currency, with a view to establishing in this way a solid foundation for Germany's capacity to pay. It was intended to force Germany to pay up to the utmost limit of her capacity. As the introduction to the Dawes report shows, the experts in investigating this question were deeply impressed by their responsibility toward the reparation commission and toward the conscience of the world. Garrett, on the other hand, maliciously claims that the creditors showed greater timidity than Germany. With regard to the third committee, the "Wiggin committee," he even insinuates that it was won over to efforts for the protection of Germany against her creditors. The task developing upon both the Dawes and the Young committees consisted in establishing by exact figures Germany's annual obligations in reparations; both committees, however, clearly realized that definite proposals could not be made. The goal to be attained by the Dawes plan was:

"(a) To transform the question of Germany's capacity to pay from a theoretical into a practical problem.

"(b) To make possible a final and comprehensive agreement respecting all questions relating to reparations as soon as circumstances permitted."

Even the Young plan, while it reduced the normal payments to be made by Germany from 2.5 to 1.8 billion reichsmarks, failed to make proposals for a complete and final adjustment of the reparation problem. Although the total amount was fixed and also the amount of annual payments to be made, the division into protected and unprotected annual payments and the appointment of the "advisory special committee" by the Bank for International Settlements was equivalent to an admission that an absolute fixation of Germany's capacity to pay for the future was not possible. At the outset, both committees deemed a loan to Germany necessary in order to give temporary relief to Germany after having passed through a period of exhaustion. This was not, as Garrett states, with a view to permitting reparation payments at the expense of new creditors. After the adoption of the two plans, it was, indeed, to Germany's advantage to earnestly fulfill her obligations, thus serving her own interests, but, above all, to preserve her credits abroad for the perpetuation of her economy.

That Germany would not be able to get along without foreign assistance was conceded in both reports. Even the Wiggin report considers the granting of foreign credits a matter of course. The responsible German authorities had constantly stressed the point that an economic body bled white by the war and its disastrous consequences, could only regain its strength by the greatest possible and continuous assistance on the part of foreign countries. In an address delivered at Bochum the former president of the Reichsbank, Schacht, declared:

"If a country has been deprived of its liquid capital by war, or by inflation to such an extent as we witnessed in Germany, it is perfectly justifiable and only natural that during the interim credit facilities are sought, just as it is done in private economy."

The MacMillan report also confirms that Germany, being forced to replenish her working capital to bear the burdens of reparations, and to build up a gold reserve, was compelled, as a matter of necessity, to seek credits in large amounts. It was for the very purpose of meeting her obligations that Germany accepted foreign money, even at excessively high rates of interest; it took money in the form of short-term loans since it could not obtain it on long terms, and invested it. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that Germany did not only seek foreign money but that in view of the prevailing high rates of interest it was abundantly offered, nay, even forced upon her. Germany was by no means unaware of the dangers lurking in an excessive indebtedness, and, above all, in an excessive indebtedness in the form of short-term loans.

The former president of the Reichsbank, Schacht, in his address at Bochum in November, 1927, also declared:

"The amount of our foreign indebtedness ought to be kept within reasonable bounds."

The activities of the advisory body should be mainly directed toward calling a halt in the increase of municipal indebtedness. It is true that reparation payments and foreign loans are related but, so far as Germany was concerned, foreign moneys to be used for economic purposes would have been necessary even without reparations. Even if there has been no necessity for paying reparations Germany would have required foreign aid in order to start again her economic machinery; she would, for a long time to come, not have been in a position to make payments out of her economic surpluses. Furthermore, as the president of the Reichsbank, Doctor Luther, stated at the press evening at the Leipzig Fair in March, 1931:

"Money paid as reparations is, in a sense, running uphill. It is not carried along by the flow of an economic river, but a political pump work forces it onward in an economically wrong direction. After having reached the summit of the political mountain, it does not flow downward, but political and psychological circumstances keep it back like dammed-up water and prevent the money from being redistributed for fructification as capital."

The economic folly inherent in the demand for political payments in amounts such as Germany is called upon to pay, rises in magnitude if, as in the case before us, payments with borrowed money are involved. Every payment with borrowed money weakens the future capacity, since, in the course of time, the burdens arising from the payment of interest and the repayment of the capital constantly grow. The continuation of the irrational movements of capital between the various countries would finally, even if the flow of foreign moneys were continued for some time, lead to a catastrophe. The breaking down of the capacity to pay followed as a matter of absolute necessity because (1) the strain upon the creditor was carried too far.

The actual value of the reparation payments, which were nominally reduced by the Paris conference of the year 1929, rose by one-fifth as a result of the fall in the price level throughout the world. Reduced revenues from taxes, growing expenditures for the unemployed, repeatedly unbalanced the Budget of the National Commonwealth, as well as of the States and municipalities in the year 1930, and made necessary the issuance of increasingly restrictive measures (emergency decrees) in order to forestall a financial collapse which would have endangered the raising of the necessary funds for the payment of reparations.

Since in the year 1931 the expected improvement in the conjunction failed to appear, it became absolutely necessary for the rehabilitation of the national finances, for unemployment insurance, emergency relief, and municipal welfare work, to squeeze out of a suffering economy during a period extending from July 1, 1931, to March 1, 1932, the enormous sum of (1) three and three-fourths billion reichsmarks by curtailing expenditures and opening up new sources of taxation. The extremely precarious economic condition of the commonwealth imperatively demanded an alleviation in Germany's unbearable reparation payments.

(2) The system of payments heretofore in force was bound to break down because the difficulties which confronted Germany herself were augmented and continually aggravated by the extraordinary world-wide depression—a depression which in the words of the Layton report "was characterized by a sharp decline in wholesale prices in the markets of the world, by a considerable falling off in the world's trade, by widespread unemployment in the industrial countries, and by acute financial difficulties in agricultural regions dependent upon foreign commerce."

(3) Germany was liable primarily to be affected by this economic casastrophe, being the weakest link in the chain of highly developed industrial nations, because of the bleeding she had been subjected to during the war and in post-war times.

Germany did not, as Garrett repeatedly stated, live beyond her means, but, because of her great vulnerability, always was one of the first countries reflecting the symptoms of a general decline in the conjuncture. The Layton report also acknowledges that Germany is particularly sensitive to economic disturbances. Inasmuch as these symptoms indicating the growing impoverishment of Germany and the constantly advancing shrinkage of her economy, could not remain a secret to foreign money lenders, Germany, of course, was the first country which, by reason of the dwindling confidence in a favorable development, was bound to feel the effect of the withdrawal of short-term loans. In view of her inability to meet the demands for repayment that assumed enormous proportions, Germany was also necessarily the first to be placed in a situation not unlike insolvency.

To insinuate, as Garet Garrett does, that Germany purposely brought about her insolvency is equivalent to closing one's eyes to the events of the last months. It also indicates a complete disregard to the reaction which it necessarily must have upon other countries which either granted Germany credits or accepted credits themselves. The present situation in England and the United States is as logical a development as that which was witnessed a few months ago in Germany. The international holiday established by the Hoover year is not, as Garrett declares, an American idea for the rescue of Germany, but it is equally in the well-considered interest of America.

What Germany needs at present is not so much new credits but a breathing spell, and the cessation on the part of her foreign creditors who granted her short-term loans to abstain from further withdrawals, i. e., to bring matters to a standstill for the present and then to agree upon an economically reasonable settlement.

Other reproaches made by Garrett have reference to the use Germany made of the foreign moneys placed at her disposal. It is particularly the construction work undertaken in postwar times which disturbs the correspondent of the Saturday Evening Post. By the publication of impressive pictures of exposition buildings, stadiums, and modern homesteads, it is intended to create the impression that Germany is the best-equipped country and has the best housing facilities in the world. This one-sided description is entirely erroneous, since, in the first place, the construction of homesteads only sufficed to mitigate to a small extent the lack of dwellings resulting from a cessation of all building activities during a period of 10 years. These homesteads are hardly within the reach of the ordinary worker. Moreover, the number of empty dwellings has trebled during the past half year in consequence of the growing economic misery, so that these buildings represent a liability rather than an asset. An objective observer would, in all fairness, have contrasted the pictures of these new homesteads with the abandoned wharves, the laid-up commercial vessels, the empty factories and business houses. Material evidence of Germany's state of misery would have been available in great abundance.

Garrett further attacks Germany on account of the flight of capital, and claims that Germany would have been able to help herself if this flight of capital had been prevented. According to Garrett, the entire present crisis can be explained simply and solely by this flight of capital. Even if we disregard the fact that Germany's indebtedness on short-term loans amounts at least to 12,000,000,000 reichsmarks as compared with Germany's claims against foreign countries in the form of short-term engagements, aggregating about two and one-half billions, even if she were to utilize her own invested capital to the fullest extent, there would still remain a balance of debts in short-term loans of about 8.5 billions. This would be a complete misconception of the nature of, and the motives underlying, the fight of capital. One of the principles in our capitalistic system governing the world economy is the free movement of capital, which finds its orientation on the basis of economic considerations, or of the confidence of the money lenders. These can not be regulated by governmental decrees. No authority in Germany would be able through official measures to recall even a fraction of the capital sent abroad. That this also applies to other countries is exemplified by England as well as by the ineffectiveness of all decrees relating to bills of exchange.

Contrary to Garet Garrett's assertions, past and future international measures and the investigation of Germany's capacity to pay do not contemplate the altruistic rescue and the welfare of Germany. The Dawes plan already stressed the fact that the reconstruction of Germany did not constitute an end in itself, but formed part of a larger problem—the reconstruction of Europe. To-day we must admit that in view of the close relations existing between the national economies the problem to be solved is the reconstruction of the world economy itself.

To accomplish this it is necessary to abandon the principle of collecting political debts. Political debts, especially if they can only be met by securing additional credits abroad, are elements of danger in the normal cycle of world economy. Germany is determined to pay her private debts. This is a fact which is substantiated by continued payments, despite the aggravation of the situation, of interest and amortization charges on her private foreign obligations. This fact was unequivocally expressed in the words uttered by the president of the Reichsbank, Doctor Luther, on the occasion of the press evening at Leipzig Fair in March, 1931:

"Germany in no wise contemplates, whatever the circumstances may be, to cease payments founded upon civil law or payments to private individuals."

Germany's full economic capacity, however, will only be reached when the material and psychological possibilities of economic life have once more been developed on a sound basis.

"UNCLE SAM AS JOB FINDER"

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I present an address delivered by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], broadcast over the National Broadcasting Co. network on February 9, 1932, under the auspices of the National League of Women Voters, which I ask may be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The discussion this evening is presented to you under the title "Uncle Sam as Job Finder." I wish I could truthfully report to you that Uncle Sam ranks high as a job finder. I wish it were possible for me to inform you that while the United States was developing and perfecting its methods of production and manufacture it was also building up a system of employment exchanges to assist the employer in finding his men and to help the idle man to find his job. No such report can be made to you. The fact is that the United States is at the tail end of the procession of civilized nations in this respect. Every industrial country of the world has to-day in operation a system of employment offices which is superior to the organization upon which we rely.

Every man who has ever had the actual experience of searching for a job needs no description from me of the cruel waste of effort and morale which our present methods involve. From door to door he wanders, aimlessly searching, groping in the dark, vainly hoping that there may be an opportunity in the next plant he will visit. This sorry condition prevails not only in times of depression but also in periods of prosperity. And the worker is not the only sufferer from the present state of disorganization. The employer is likewise handicapped. He has as much trouble in securing the right man as the worker in finding the right job. The consequences are a needless waste of time and money, loss of production, and continuous maladjustment.

The realization of these incontrovertible facts has moved me, as it has moved everyone who has taken an interest in the problem, to the conclusion that the operation of employment offices was properly a function of government; that this country needs a system of employment offices, nation-wide in extent, easily accessible to workers and employers, operated by men and women specially equipped and trained for this very difficult task, and so organized as to enjoy the confidence of employers, workers, and the public.

The realization of this goal was in sight at the end of the last session of Congress, when both the House of Representatives and the United States Senate passed the employment office bill I had introduced. The President, however, withheld his signature from the bill. And thus was the effort to provide an adequate employment service for the United States for the time being frustrated.

Since then the administration has attempted, without new legislation, to expand the existing so-called United States Employment Service. About a million dollars has been appropriated in the effort. But it seems to me we are no nearer a satisfactory employment service. The administration's effort has, in my judgment, been a failure and is bound to be a failure. The existing Employment Service can not succeed because it is organized on the wrong principle, staffed in the wrong method, and does not enjoy the confidence of the people whom it is intended to serve.

The first question that must be faced in the organization of a nation-wide employment service is this: What shall be the relation between the Federal Government and the States in the conduct of such a service?

We know that the Federal Government can not alone perform the entire task. Many of the employment problems are local, requiring knowledge of local conditions for their proper solution. At the same time we know equally well that the States can not separately provide for the interstate placement of workers which is essential in dealing comprehensively with the problem of unemployment. Certainly we do not want the Federal Government to duplicate the work of the States. Certainly we do not want the Federal Government to compete with the States. Common sense points to the solution, namely, the creation of a cooperative system wherein the Federal Government and the States join together in the conduct of the employment service. Then each of the States retains responsibility for the local offices and control over their management and the Federal Government performs the duties which are interstate in character.

This principle of cooperation is the corner stone of the bill which I have reintroduced in the United States Senate. It is absent from the organization which is now in existence. The result is that from all parts of the country—from Kentucky, from Tennessee, from New York, from Virginia, from Connecticut—reports reach me of noncooperation between Federal and State authorities, of duplication of effort, of downright competition. No satisfactory service can be built upon such a foundation.

Another major question must be answered in the formation of a system of employment offices. How shall we secure for such a service the confidence of employers and employees? This question touches the vital spot of the problem. Obviously, if employers will not use the service to hire the workers they require, or if employees will not resort to the service when they are in search of jobs, then the whole enterprise is futile. Experience has demonstrated that both employers and employees will not utilize the facilities of a public-employment service unless they are fully satisfied of its fairness, its impartiality, its competence, and its freedom from politics.

In the bill which I advocate two methods are used to create the kind of service which would justify such confidence. The first is the provision that every Federal employee in the United States Employment Service shall be selected on merit alone, through proper examination, and without regard to his political affiliation. In addition, the bill provides that in Washington and in each State there shall be an advisory council of men and women representing the employers and employees in equal numbers. Upon these councils is imposed the duty of insuring for the service impartiality, neutrality, and freedom from political influence.

What is the condition in the existing Federal employment service in these respects? It has neither the protection of the civil service nor the protection of the advisory council. It is known that many employees in the existing employment service have secured their positions through the method of political patronage.

Such a system can never enjoy the confidence of the American people. There is, in my judgment, grave danger that a system so organized will in time regard every private job as the legitimate spoils of the party in power. I regard that possibility as a menace against which we should take every necessary precaution.

An employment service created under the terms of the bill I have introduced would, in addition to its general functions, provide us with prompt information of employment and unemployment, of available opportunities for work throughout the length and breadth of the Nation. It would provide special facilities for veterans. It would make available a specialized service for the farmers.

Eleven years ago in the city of Washington a great conference was held to consider ways and means of combating the unemployment of 1921. One of the recommendations of that conference was the establishment of the kind of employment service described in the bill I have introduced.

Since then three congressional committees, after full hearings, have each independently come to the conclusion that the bill I introduced should become law.

How much longer will the taking of this intelligent step be delayed?

Had such an employment service been in operation in 1928 and 1929, we could not possibly have been caught as unprepared as we were by the storm which broke loose upon the country more than two years ago and has not yet spent its fury.

Each of us hopes and devoutly prays that the present distress of our Nation may soon pass away. We expect to see agriculture again become a profitable way of life, and trade and industry resume their busy existence. When that time comes we shall be faced with the problem of guiding 8,000,000 men and women back to employment. Will the return be accomplished with wisdom, with order, with a view to leading every worker to the place most suitable to his capacities, and thus sustaining and lifting the standard of living of the American people?

If you would make sure of an affirmative answer to that question, you must exert every effort to provide the United States promptly with a nation-wide, cooperative, nonpolitical employment service.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles relating to the Filipino question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

The articles are as follows:

[From the New York Times, February 6, 1932]

SELF-RULE DEMAND LESSENS IN MANILA—LEADING DAILY IS FOR CAUTION BECAUSE OF THE CONFLICT IN THE FAR EAST—OUR PROBLEM RECOGNIZED—ISLANDS HELD AS VITAL FACTOR FOR AMERICA NOW—LITTLE INTEREST IN WASHINGTON HEARING

MANILA, February 5.—A change in Filipino opinion toward gaining independence under the present disturbed world conditions was sharply indicated by an editorial this morning in the Tribune, a leading Filipino daily.

The Tribune, nonpartisan and influential, is usually fairly representative of conservative Filipino opinion. The editor is a regent of the university, closely allied with political movements and leaders. The editorial discussed the reasons why the present situation changes the aspects of the demand for freedom, calling for caution and stating:

"There is a coincidence that the occasion for a favorable settlement of the Philippine problem comes simultaneously with the outbreak of hostilities in the Far East.

"Regardless of all other factors that must serve to make America less able fully to attend to the issue of our future, we have become immediately a detail of her larger interest in the whole Far East.

YIELD TO SITUATION

"Under such conditions the independence movement necessarily suffers a setback. Our own national demand for emancipation, supreme though it be, our conception of what is best and permanent for our welfare, must give way to the international situation that has developed at our very door.

"Due regard must be given, furthermore, to the sense of responsibility of the American Government. That Government has consistently declared its intention to transfer to Filipino hands the powers of sovereignty in these islands. If there has been delay in the redemption of that pledge, the reason has been the high-minded care with which America would discharge her obligations to the Filipino people.

"If with conditions in the Far East normal America has had no occasion to perform that duty, there is much less of an occasion now, with war actually unsettling conditions. We would venture the suggestion that for America to leave the islands now, even in recognition of our right to a sovereign existence, would be for her possibly to be accused of quitting under fire.

"The Philippines are admittedly a weak point in America's problem of defense in the Pacific. That might be linked with a grant of freedom by the United States to cast reflection upon her as a power.

"We sense in the American character a conviction that would make for the protection of the American name, hence the postponement of independence."

FEAR SELFISH MOTIVES

This may help to explain the comparative apathy of the Filipino press regarding the independence hearings at Washington. Aside from a party convention's indorsement of statements by Speaker Manuel Roxas, there has been little comment on the testimony given.

An additional factor is probably the feeling that the American proponents of Filipino independence thus far testifying are actuated solely by selfish motives.

One voice heard, however, is that of Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, who issued a formal statement this afternoon attacking Manuel Quezon's idea of a period of autonomy in preparation for independence and contending that the only possible position is for the Filipinos to demand immediate independence.

Local opinion was inclined to regard General Aguinaldo's statement as purely political, inspired by his long-standing feud with Mr. Quezon. General Aguinaldo once was a stanch supporter of the American idea to defer independence until the proper time, but became a strong advocate of immediate independence after a falling out with Mr. Quezon, who is president of the Philippine Senate.

HAVE OUR AMERICAN PRODUCERS BEEN BLINDED BY PROPAGANDA?

By John R. Wilson, secretary American Chamber of Commerce

The following notice appeared in Manila newspapers of October 15, 1931:

(By United Press)

"WASHINGTON, October 14.—* * * of the American Farm Bureau Federation, declared that he expected that the Philippine question will be one of the principal topics at the forthcoming session of Congress.

"Farm support of independence comes from sugar-producing States, dairy interests, and cotton-producing regions, because Philippine products are providing competition."

And on October 16 the following:

(By United Press)

"VANCOUVER, B. C., October 15.—* * * The American Federation of Labor to-day adopted a committee report resolving in favor of the exclusion of all Filipino laborers and the indepdendence of the Philippine Islands."

Both entities are the blind victims of subtle propaganda and come as near emulating the ostrich as is possible by a vertebrate of the genus homo.

It is not intended to discuss in this article the question of independence, nor the whys and wherefores thereof; for the time being we will leave that to the politicians. However, if independence does become a reality it will not be a result of the lamentations of the "subject people," but rather the direct result of vicious propaganda and politics in the United States.

We do desire to call the attention of American farmers, producers, manufacturers, and labor to a possibility that is much nearer realization than many people suspect; viz, the restriction of free-trade privileges now enjoyed on Philippine products entering the United States.

Do the American producers wish to hold one of their best customers? The present world-wide crisis has shown that you can not sell your goods unless you buy the other fellow's. If you deprive us of our earning power you are the ones who will suffer as much as we. If we have money, we spend; but if we have not, we can still exist even though our diet, dress, and personal comforts may be limited.

There are two sides to every question. If the United States Congress insists upon levying a customs duty upon sugar, coconut oil, copra, and other Philippine products, there is no just reason why the Philippine government should not be accorded like privileges as regards the levying of customs duties upon United States goods entering the Philippine Islands.

Now, let us get on with our story. For a number of years there has been an insidious campaign on the part of Cuban sugar interests to restrict the importation, duty free, of Philippine sugar into the United States. Knowing full well they could never hope to gain their point with sugar alone, the Cuban interests have enlisted the aid of domestic sugar producers of the United States and other producers, principally cotton and dairy, of the United States in the clamor for restriction of Philippine products entering the United States, such as sugar, coconut oil, tobacco, etc.

SUGAR

Let us first take up the item of sugar. Philippine sugar does not compete with United States domestic sugar and never will as long as it is necessary to import two or three million tons from Cuba. If either the full United States duty or the Cuban duty (80 per cent of the full duty) is applied to the Philippine product, the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands would immediately become nonexistent. Without the United States market, under free-trade arrangements, sugar could not be grown in the Philippines at a profit. There was a time when Philippine sugar, made by the open-kettle method, had a market in China and other oriental countries. The introduction of the centrifugal process in Java and the development of the industry in Formosa and other oriental countries has killed the market for such open-kettle sugar, except for a very limited amount made by isolated planters and marketed at a ridiculously low price. Practically all Philippine sugar of to-day is centrifugal and the cost of production is so high that it can not compete with Cuba, Java, or any other oriental country. This cost of production is due to several causes, the principal one being the cost of labor. Since American occupation the standard of living of the Filipinos has risen to a much higher standard than any other oriental country and they demand as necessities what other orientals would consider unobtainable luxuries.

There was a time not so many years ago that the stock in trade of the small stores supplying the working classes consisted mainly of rice and dried fish. To-day these stores have shelves, and the shelves are filled with America's highest grades of canned goods, also many brands of American cigarettes. Speaking of cigarettes, 25 years ago the Filipino was content to smoke Philippine cigarettes costing not more than one-sixth of a cent. Now he must have an American cigarette costing one-half cent each before he is satisfied. Twenty-five years ago the laborer was content to walk through life without shoes. To-day the United States sells shoes and leather for shoes costing $2,000,000, and the socks to go with them.

There is also the smaller production of sugar per acre than is obtained in other countries. Hawaii, Cuba, and Java produce two and three times as much sugar per acre at less than half the cost. If the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands is killed, the result is obvious, viz, that the purchasing power of the Philippines will be reduced in an amount equal to the value of the sugar now produced, which was $49,312,657 in 1930. This is a staggering figure when it is considered that the entire exports of the Philippine Islands for 1930 amounted to $133,167,127. In other words, the reduction would be 37 per cent on account of sugar alone. The money realized from exports is largely spent in the purchase of foreign goods to be consumed in the Philippine Islands. In 1930 the total imports of the Philippine Islands amounted to $123,092,953, or nearly 92 per cent of the total exports. Of this amount, 63 per cent, amounting to $78,133,028, was spent in the United States. Deducting the pro rata of the sugar loss would leave the maximum amount of purchases from the United States at $53,564,000, or a loss of sales to the farmers, producers, and manufacturers of the United States amounting to $24,618,000, or practically one-third of the total. Do the farmers, producers, and manufacturers of the United States wish to forego sales of $24,000,000 for the sole purpose of benefiting a country foreign to the United States, such as is Cuba. If our sugar industry is abolished, you will see sales of $24,000,000 walking off the United States stage at the same time. It is more likely that the loss of sales would be nearer double.

COTTON

The cotton and dairy interests have been particularly antagonistic to coconut oil. They have been given to understand that inasmuch as coconut oil, like cottonseed oil, is an edible fat, it is therefore entirely competitive with cottonseed oil on the market. This is not the case. Although both oils may be used in the manufacture of edible and soap products and both cakes may be used for stock food or fertilizers, yet cottonseed oil is preferable for edible purposes, particularly lard compounds, and as such commands and must continue to command a higher price. Coconut oil, on the other hand, is very largely a soap oil and as such has certain advantages over cottonseed oil. Thus coconut oil competes with cottonseed oil only in the lower fringes, and as long as there is a demand for edible oil cottonseed will get the call at higher prices. Normally speaking, the cottonseed crop is just about sufficient to take care of the demand for edible oil, and any barriers erected against coconut oil and copra would result, first of all, in an increased cost of soap, thus making every American family help shoulder the burden of this senseless exclusion without materially benefiting cottonseed oil.

While cottonseed-oil cake and copra cake can be utilized for the same purpose, cottonseed-oil cake has a higher food value and always commands a far higher price than copra cake. Thus as long as cottonseed cake is offered, copra cake can only be sold at a much lower price.

There is another side to this angle and in a few words we will show what the Philippines mean to the United States cotton growers.

WHAT THE PHILIPPINES MEAN TO THE UNITED STATES COTTON GROWER

In 1930 the Philippines was the largest export customer for American cotton goods. This may surprise you, but it is nevertheless a fact. In 1930 the Philippines imported United States cotton goods valued at $8,650,000. In 1929 the value was $15,848,000.

To corroborate our statement that inability to sell our products at profitable prices would be directly reflected in our purchases, please note that the value of Philippine copra and coconut oil exported in 1930 was $14,000,000 less than for 1929. American cotton suffered half this difference, or to be exact, $7,198,000.

Does not the cotton-textile trade with the Philippines more than offset any loss on cottonseed?

COCONUT OIL AND COPRA

Copra is the dried meat of the coconut, after the water content of the coconut meat has been evaporated, either by sun drying or artificial means; then the oil is pressed out. After pressing there are two commodities ready for market—oil and copra meal, the percentage being about 60 and 35, respectively.

As matters now stand, copra enters the United States from all countries of the world free of duty. As long as this condition exists, no protection will be given the cotton people. They would have the same amount of competition from coconut oil and there would be an additional 85,000 tons of copra cake to compete with cottonseed meal, the only difference being that the oil would still be in the copra upon arrival in the United States. If you are going to put a restriction on coconut oil to protect the cotton interests, why not place a corresponding duty on copra and in this way divert both the copra and oil to Europe, throw the American oil-mill labor into the unemployed class, and allow the consumers of the United States to foot the bill for increased costs and the tariff of $10,000,000 annually? This increased cost of oil purchased from European oil mills would accrue to foreign labor, while our own labor walks the streets. The United States oil manufacturers enjoy an export trade in coconut oil of about half a million dollars annually simply because they can secure the raw product mostly from a country now under our own flag. Would they be willing to sacrifice this trade on account of friendship for the cotton and dairy interests? Just try to put a duty on copra and see how long this friendship would endure.

DAIRY

The fight of the dairy interests has been bitter. They claim that coconut oil is used in the manufacture of oleomargarine and other edible products that compete with butter. Cottonseed oil is used principally in lard substitutes for the simple reason that it does not froth when heated and coconut oil does. It is true that coconut oil used in the manufacture of soap does release a corresponding amount of cottonseed oil for cooking compounds.

The mere placing of a duty upon Philippine coconut oil would not help the dairy interests one iota. The milling of the copra would simply be transferred from the Philippines to the United States, thereby increasing the copra-meal supply of the United States by over 80,000 tons. This meal now goes mostly to Europe from the Philippines. Copra meal is used for stock food, and this amount would make quite a difference to some United States farmers who raise other kinds of stock food and in a way benefit the cotton raisers by providing a competitive stock food.

WHAT THE PHILIPPINES MEAN TO THE UNITED STATES DAIRY INTERESTS

We can reiterate the statement made in connection with cotton.

In 1930 the Philippines was the largest export customer of United States milk. During that period the Philippines imported 29,000,000 pounds, valued at $2,700,000. Add to the milk 203,000 pounds of butter and 486,000 pounds of cheese with a value of $176,000.

How many United States cows does it require to produce the above items?

All that holds the milk market for the United States is again the protection of the customs duty against foreign goods. If anyone wishes proof of this statement, just investigate the milk market of Cuba and note that Cuba gets its milk from Europe, notwithstanding the fact that Cuba is at the threshold of the United States and grants a 20 per cent customs preference to United States goods. United States milk is protected in the Philippines by a 10 per cent ad valorem duty on foreign milk.

OTHER COMMODITIES PURCHASED FROM UNITED STATES FARMERS—FLOUR

During 1930 the Philippine imports of United States flour amounted to 136,056,383 pounds, valued at $3,981,186.

Do you realize that this means the wheat produced on 244,000 acres of American farms? Free entry of United States flour made this possible. Flour from countries other than the United States must pay a tariff of 21 cents per 100 pounds.

During 1901 there was imported United States flour valued at $356,000; 1908, $507,000; 1930, $3,981,000. The increase in purchases of 1930 over 1908 was about 700 per cent, this 700 per cent increase over 1908 being due to Philippine tariff protection. If you restrict our purchasing power, you simply force us to eat rice and forget flour. Cut us adrift and what flour we will buy will come from Australia and China. An additional amount of $266,000 must be added to the wheat item on account of other breadstuffs imported.

FRUIT FARMERS

Apples

In 1930 we ate 5,000,000 pounds of apples, valued at $282,514. Ten years ago it was 1,800,000 pounds, valued at $114,000.

How many acres in apple orchards does this represent?

Oranges

The 1930 imports of oranges from America amounted to 3,262,000 pounds, valued at $139,000.

VEGETABLE FARMERS

United States vegetables, fresh and canned, valued at over half a million dollars were consumed in 1930.

If you will consult the detailed statement herewith, you will see that nearly every farmer grows something we buy in the Philippines.

FISHERIES

In 1930 the Philippines consumed United States mackerel, salmon, and sardines weighing 22,209,523 pounds and valued at $1,313,358, nearly 2 pounds for each man, woman, and child in the Philippines.

TOBACCO

There has also been some opposition to Philippine tobacco registered by the cigar and cigarette interests of the United States. This opposition, however, has subsided of late, probably due to the fact that the Philippine Islands imported last year 1,075,737,000 cigarettes, valued at $2,031,792, plus tobacco leaf amounting to $304,000 and chewing tobacco amounting to $445,000, totaling $2,780,792, which was practically the same as the value of the cigars exported from the Philippines to the United States during the same period.

A REMINDER TO UNITED STATES LABOR

In addition to the labor requirements of the farmers in growing the produce already written about, it might be well to consider the following figures:

In 1930 the Philippines imported from the United States manufactured brass to the value of $61,000; electrical machinery, $4,414,000; manufactures of iron and steel, $14,918,000; the total of the three items being $19,793,000. Undoubtedly a considerable portion of this amount represents wages paid American workmen, but the labor leaders are willing to see this money spent in other countries where labor is cheaper. If labor leaders would worry one-tenth as much about furthering the interests of American workmen engaged in manufacturing for export trade that they do over the question of a few thousand Filipinos living in the United States, they would be doing something constructive rather than destructive.

It is as much the affair of labor to protect itself in the matter of export trade as it is that of the manufacturer, and it is high time labor was taking steps to protect itself as far as Philippine trade is concerned. Its action in recommending restriction of Filipinos entering the United States will prove a double-edged weapon. When you refuse them this privilege and give them independence you just lose $78,000,000 of trade. What labor might gain in wages now paid Filipinos in America it would lose a thousandfold in wages paid Americans working on export-trade commodities.

American labor, through its organizations, wishes to smash a ready-made market that provides work for tens of thousands of Americans. This object they can accomplish in either one of two ways—cutting us adrift or raising a tariff wall against us. In the first case our purchases would be made in the cheap-labor countries of Europe and Asia, and in the second case you would simply curtail our revenues and purchasing power by at least half, thereby forcing us to curtail our desires and buy only necessities of low standard.

It is desired to bring to the attention of the farmers, producers, manufacturers, and labor of the United States the fact that they are being grossly deceived and that there is a possibility of losing an export market of great value to them through the restriction of free-trade privileges on goods entering the United States from the Philippine Islands.

Just how many sane farmers, producers, manufacturers, and laborers would knowingly throw away an opportunity for legitimate profit on a large scale?

A little study of actual conditions will show (1) that there has been no analysis made of the United States trade with the Philippines, or (2) there has been deliberate concealment of the facts on the part of those who are fostering the anti-Philippine propaganda. The propagandists against the free entry of Philippine products do not tell the producers the true story. The only reason the United States interests enjoy the trade of the Philippine Islands to the extent they do is on account of the free trade, existing both ways, between the United States and the Philippine Islands. To restrict Philippine products entering the United States without restricting the free entry of American products into the Philippine Islands free of duty would be just plain dishonesty. To play fair and allow the Philippine Islands to impose restrictions upon American goods would kill the Philippine market for such goods as completely as one could imagine. Our dairy interests would cease to sell their products in this country, and the market would be gobbled by Norway, Switzerland, and other countries of Europe the same as it has been in Cuba.

It is suggested that the leaders of the dairy interests investigate this point and advise Members accordingly that the same loss of trade would be true in the Philippine Islands. As regards cotton goods, Japan, China, and Europe would immediately take the Philippine buying market. Take the one item of bleached cotton cloth; in 1930 the consumption of this article from Japan increased more than 100 per cent over 1929, while the export from the United States to the Philippines decreased more than 50 per cent in the same period. The same result with varying percentages holds good right through the list of cotton fabrics. There is a remedy for this condition, and our cotton manufacturers in the United States are the ones to see that the same is applied.

This article is intended primarily for American farmers and dairy interests, and in order that they may have some idea of what the Philippine Islands consume yearly of their products, attention is called to the following table showing the quantity of each product, and the value thereof, imported into the Philippine Islands during the year 1930. It is suggested that every farmer and manufacturer of farm products read the table carefully and see if the Philippine market means anything to him:

POPULAR SELECTION OF CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, my attention has been called to a very interesting address delivered by Hon. Joseph I. France, formerly a Member of the United States Senate, before the Progressive Republican League of North Dakota, September 16, 1931, on the subject of the direct selection by the people of nominees for President and Vice President. It is a most important and timely subject and is worthy of the consideration of citizens everywhere in America. I ask unanimous consent that extracts from the address may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The extracts are as follows:

Because of the enormous powers now centralized in a President, and his power of appointment and removal of the members of the various commissions now established in our country, the popular selection of candidates for presidential and vice presidential nominations under our form of government is most important.

For many years I have been an ardent advocate of popular rather than delegated or invisible government.

It would probably take several decades before a Federal constitutional amendment could be enacted either for the direct election of President and Vice President or for the direct selection of nominees by the two great parties of their choice for President and Vice President.

It is, however, feasible and most highly desirable that every State in the Union should adopt a constitutional amendment or law enabling the electorate of the two great parties to instruct their delegates to national conventions as to who they should vote for, both for the presidential and vice presidential nominations, and to further instruct their national delegates to vote for a rule in the convention declaring that whoever should receive the greatest number of votes in that convention for President and whoever should receive the greatest number of votes in that convention for Vice President would thereby become the party nominees of said national convention for these respective offices.

Such a rule would thereby abolish the present rule of requiring a majority vote in the Republican national convention and a two-thirds vote in the Democratic national convention.

National delegates would thus become mere messengers as far as selecting their nominees for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, conveying to their respective national conventions the wishes of their State party electorates in this particular.

The declaration by each State of its choice for President and Vice President would be in no sense a wider departure from the Constitution than was the transformation of the Electoral College into a mere registering and recording board, yet no one thinks such change is any wise revolutionary.

The Nation as a whole and the world in general would immediately know who the nominees of the two parties would be for both President and Vice President as soon as the State holding the last presidential preference primary has expressed its choice in each party primary for party nomination for the Presidency and the party nomination for the Vice Presidency.

Thus accountability to the people alone would be established and aspirants for the Presidency and Vice Presidency would be freed from the necessity of consulting the wishes of the few men who so often make and manipulate conventions.

The power of the Federal machine to renominate a President or Vice President or determine their successors would thereby be absolutely destroyed.

Presidents and Vice Presidents would thus become accountable to the people as a whole, rather than to a few large campaign contributors and a few political manipulators.

The people would select and then elect for their chief public servants the individuals enjoying the greatest confidence at the time of the general election.

Confidence in our Government is a prerequisite for national contentment and happiness and business efficiency.

ADDRESS OF HON. JOUETT SHOUSE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by Mr. Jouett Shouse, chairman of the Democratic National Executive Committee, at a dinner at the Hotel Kanawha, Charleston, W. Va., on February 5, 1932.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT OF DEMOCRATIC PROSPECTS?

I come to West Virginia primarily at the invitation of the younger Democrats of the State, but it is a happy development of my trip that this gathering to-night represents not merely the younger element of the party but every element of the party, men and women alike, and that it is state-wide in its scope.

It is particularly a pleasure to have the opportunity to address an audience such as this in the State that has honored itself by giving to my good friend Senator M. M. NEELY the largest majority ever accorded to any man running for public office in West Virginia. In selecting him you have shown judgment, sense, and discretion. He is a man of ability, a man of character, a man of courage, a man of good, hard common sense, who represents most satisfactorily the aims and the aspirations and the needs of your State in the most important deliberative body in the world. The majority that you gave Senator NEELY in 1930 indicates that West Virginia should be and easily can be made a Democratic State. It is but another in the galaxy of Commonwealths where the prospect of Democratic success looms large in the elections of 1932 if the Democratic Party conducts itself with courage, with patriotism, with wisdom.

WARNS AGAINST OVERCONFIDENCE

I have said before, and I think it well to repeat here, that the gravest peril that confronts our party prospects at the present time is the danger of overconfidence. It is true that the Republican Party will be compelled to renominate the most unpopular President of the past half century. It will renominate him, but it will do it unwillingly, ungraciously, sullenly. It is true that the record of his administration, upon which the next campaign will be conducted, is a record of ineptness and vacillation. Its only two legislative acts of consequence to which any man can point are the so-called farm relief bill, which has left the farmers in worse plight than they were at the time of its passage and which has projected the dangerous experiment of the Government in business, and the Hoover-Grundy tariff bill which has destroyed our foreign trade and has done more to continue the hardships of the Hoover panic than all other forces combined. Upon the record as it stands Democratic success would seem well-nigh assured. The danger is that Democrats in their overconfidence may feel that they can elect any candidate upon any platform, and therein lies the possibility of real peril.

The last thing in the world that I would discuss is the matter of candidacies. Our national headquarters has not thrown, and will not throw, the weight of its influence to any one of the several eminent gentlemen who very properly aspire to the nomination for President, or to any one of those who while not active candidates have been mentioned in connection with that distinguished honor. Our duty is to get ready to elect the ticket that is nominated, and the activities that have been carried on unceasingly in our headquarters at Washington for the past two and a half years have made ready the party to achieve a remarkable political victory.

UNPRECEDENTED DEMOCRATIC VICTORY IN 1930

In 1930 in the by-elections we administered to the Republican Party the most crushing defeat that any Republican administration has ever received in the middle of a presidential term. We wiped out a Republican majority of more than a hundred in the House of Representatives and elected a Democratic Speaker, for the first time since 1917, by the votes of Democrats, without entangling alliances and without promises of favor or patronage to any Member of the House. We reduced the Republican majority in the Senate from 16 down to 1, and while the party of Mr. Hoover is in nominal control of that body, it is so rifted and divided that the only cohesive and effective force is the Democratic membership.

The work that our headquarters has done the past two and a half years will be carried on with even greater vigor up to the convention, and we shall be prepared to turn over to the new national committee then created a party organization such as we have not had before, at least for many, many years. The organization will be ready, the Democratic story has been told to the people, and they are in a receptive mood to show preference to Democratic candidates.

Without reference to who he may be, I need scarcely call your attention to the fact that the character and the quality of the candidate nominated is of the highest importance. This is a time when America is crying for leadership as never before, and not merely America but the entire world. The world can look only to America for the leadrship that it needs and that it desires, and unless America supplies that leadership then the plight of the world will be sad indeed. It has become woefully apparent that Mr. Hoover does not possess the qualities of leadership. It has been sadly and tragically impressed that the time-worn policies of the Republican Party will not answer the demands of the hour. There is required of us that we give of the best that is in us, and if we so give we shall place the Democratic Party in power not merely for a presidential term but for 20 years to come. It is with that picture and not the mere success of one election that I am particularly concerned.

As I have said, we administered to the Republican Party in 1930 a crushing defeat, but we won for the Democratic Party not so much a victory as an opportunity. If we take advantage of that opportunity, if we show ourselves possessed of courage and vision and wisdom and determination to effect for the people those things of which they are so sadly in need, then we shall win, and we shall deserve to win not merely in 1932 but again in 1936, in 1940, and for years to come.

HOOVER RECORD VERSUS DEMOCRATIC PROGRAM

It is true that the Hoover administration will be an important issue in the coming campaign, but in passing upon its claim for a second term the country should not take into account merely the sins of omission and commission that have characterized its tenure of office. It should also give due weight to the substitutive program which the Democratic Party may see fit to offer. Under the form of government that has prevailed in America for more than a hundred years, regardless of what may have been the intent of the framers of the Constitution, we have had a definite rule by party. I, for one, believe that such rule should continue. I believe that responsibility should be assumed and discharged in accordance with a party program and that the members of the legislative branch of the Government, elected with a President of their party, should stand ready and willing to carry out the mandate of the people in placing them in power. A platform promise is a sacred pledge. No party has the right to make a declaration of principles that it does not intend to fulfill. Each Member of Congress stands as definitely upon the platform as does the candidate for the Presidency. Thus there devolves upon the membership of Congress the implied duty and obligation of cooperation to carry out the party pledge.

Let me make clear that no individual—indeed, no group of individuals—can attempt to outline the course of action that may be expected of the Democratic Party. The national platform of the party is written each four years by its national convention. The declarations of that platform constitute party policy. The only enunciation of principles now standing before the American people as authoritative expression of our party is the platform written at Houston in 1928. A new platform will be adopted at the Chicago convention in the summer of 1932. I do not know what it will contain. Any suggestions that may be made by me are mere personal expressions representing my view of what my party may most wisely indorse and enunciate.

DEMOCRATS' POSITIVE PLATFORM ON ALL ISSUES

Within the past two years it has been my business to get in touch with political opinion among different groups and in different sections of the country. I have made it a point to attempt to secure particularly some idea of the attitude of the younger generation, and I have found that a very large number of those who have recently become voters, or those who are about to become voters, voice a feeling of intolerance if not disgust with each of the two major political parties on the score that they are ruled largely by expediency. This dissatisfaction of the younger element applies particularly to political platforms. The accusation is made, and with entire justice, that the object in view in writing a platform is apparently to avoid saying something rather than to attempt to declare concretely, accurately, honestly, and courageously the program for which the party stands and the things which may be expected of it if put in power.

As a Democrat, I do not hesitate to admit my party has been guilty of procedure of this character. Certainly it is well known that the Republican Party has been similarly guilty. Indeed, in the last campaign even the personal views of the Republican candidate upon at least one of the important problems confronting the American people were in doubt. In his Palo Alto speech accepting the nomination Mr. Hoover said of prohibition: "Our country has deliberately undertaken a great social and economic experiment, noble in motive and far-reaching in purpose. It must be worked out constructively." On the basis of that statement dry Republican newspapers of the West claimed that he was absolutely opposed to any change in the present situation, while wet Republican newspapers of the East claimed that he was definitely in favor of modification.

The youth of the land demands courage and character. It demands these qualities of candidates. It demands them of political parties. It has a right so to demand, and I am hopeful that the demand may be vocal enough and influential enough to compel both of the parties, in the platforms to be written this year preliminary to the presidential election, to state concretely their stand upon the questions of the day.

PLATFORM SUGGESTIONS

As to the position the Democratic Party will take, I can only surmise. Recently in response to a request from the Democratic Bulletin of the Woman's National Democratic Club of Washington I outlined in a very tentative and incomplete way some of the things that I believe the next Democratic platform must encompass. Of course, it was merely a personal suggestion, nor did it purport to cover all of the issues that will be of probable consequence in the next campaign. It did attempt to deal with perhaps the most outstanding of present-day problems that the people of the country generally—and particularly the younger group—are discussing.

It may be of interest to refer briefly to some of these problems. With the Nation in the throes of a panic, the severity and extent of which are unequaled in our history, there immediately comes into every mind the question of possible remedy by legislation for the conditions that so distress us. Admittedly there may be little that can be accomplished legislatively, but there should be taken whatever steps may help to avoid for the future the recurrence of such a situation as now prevails.

The most dire consequence upon any panic is widespread unemployment. To-day there are more than 7,000,000 men out of work. In addition, there are many millions more dependent upon those forced into idleness and there are additional millions who are working only part time with their incomes consequently reduced to a minimum. In some of the large industries wage cuts have already been instituted. In others they are now pending. Because the reserves of many families have been exhausted the threat of actual want and suffering this winter is more widespread and severe than last year.

WAGNER EMPLOYMENT BILL VETOED

There is, of course, no actual panacea for unemployment. There are sane and intelligent steps that can be taken to meet such a situation. Measures of this nature were early advocated and long urged by Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, an able Democrat, of New York. Briefly summarized they provide machinery for accurate determination of the extent of unemployment, they fixed definite provision for long-time planning of Government projects to enable the incidence of the actual work at the most desirable time, and they set up joint agencies of State and Federal Governments to find work for the unemployed. The conversion of these measures into legislation was impeded in every possible way by the administration, and, finally, when, despite such opposition, through the force of public opinion the bills passed Congress, the most important of them was vetoed by President Hoover.

It is not here suggested that the bills promptly enacted into law, with adequate appropriation to carry out their provisions, could have cured the unemployment situation. It is, however, most definitely contended that the provisions of these bills effective two years ago, as they would have been, save for administration opposition, would have offered definite means to remedy in part the trying situation which has grown constantly worse rather than better. I do not hesitate to predict that the Democratic Party will carry through the Wagner program, and I further assert that if placed in control of the Government it will exercise the same assiduity in attempting to find sane and reasonable preventives for the curse of unemployment as it did when last in power in creating, through the Federal reserve act, the machinery necessary to avoid mere monetary panics.

OPPOSES FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

One of the steps involved in the problem is the question of unemployment insurance. On two recent occasions prominent spokesmen for the Republican Party, no doubt coached by the publicity division of the Republican National Committee, have charged that I indorse Federal unemployment insurance which these gentlemen described as nothing more or less than the dole. This statement is quite as accurate as many of those emanating from such sources. I challenge the assertion that I have ever voiced approval of Federal unemployment insurance. On the other hand, I do not favor it, but I do favor and earnestly hope my party will recommend unemployment insurance by industry, made compulsory by the States in the same manner as workmen's compensation. Unless compulsory it will never become generally effective. And I hold that industry owes something to the working man, who through no fault of his own is thrown out of a job and who is entitled to a measure of protection from becoming a charity charge upon the community.

What, after all, is the so-called dole? If it be a dole for the Federal Government to make an appropriation to feed starving people, is it any the less a dole for these people to accept aid at the hands of private charities or at the hands of city or county or State? I, for one, believe that every private agency should be used to the uttermost to take care of those who can not find employment and who are in destitution and want. But if through the agency of private benefaction the situation can not be cared for, if appropriations made by city, county and State prove inadequate and can not be enlarged, then so far as I am concerned I am in favor of direct appropriation by the Federal Government to prevent American men and women and children from starving during the remaining months of this winter. If that be a dole, then make the most of it.

FOREIGN RELATIONS

Another thing that the people of the country are thinking about, and particularly to which the youth of the land are giving earnest consideration, is the relationship of America to the rest of the world. If proof of the fact were needed it must have become apparent to all who are not blind that America can not live as a nation apart. A relationship so close that it can not be escaped has been established by modern conditions, modern trade relations, modern methods of transportation, and unless America does its part in the world picture the people of America are bound to suffer as a result of their own neglect. We can not build up tariff walls that create an embargo on foreign goods and expect foreign nations to buy from us. We can not slap in the face the best of our customers and expect them not to retaliate. The Republican policy of protection gone mad, carried to its logical extreme of an embargo tariff, has destroyed our foreign trade. The Hoover-Grundy tariff bill, first in its threats and later in its actualities, has been the one most potent factor in bringing about the panic from which we are suffering, and until that fact is realized and remedied there is no hope for the restoration of permanent prosperity.

REDUCTION OF ARMAMENT

The people of the world to-day are weighted down with an intolerable burden of armament. At a time when governments are tottering on the verge of bankruptcy this tremendous expenditure goes on. Unfortunately we are witnessing in the Far East what appears to be an attempt at aggressive and unjustified conquest by an ambitious nation bent on its own aggrandizement. The force which it seeks to exercise can be counteracted only by united action. Extreme measures by the rest of the world may be necessary before the war dogs which that country apparently is intent on loosing can be got under control. There may be no alternative except to teach the Japanese race the lesson which apparently they richly deserve. But that does not argue against every proper and sane movement that may be made for the reduction of armament. Indeed, on the contrary, it is the strongest argument in favor of such a plan, because Japan, curbed in its military effectiveness, controlled in the matter of armed force by land and sea, would not dare to make upon China an unjustified and a selfish military attack and could not be in a position to threaten seriously the peace of the world.

FOREIGN WAR DEBTS

No man is wise enough to foresee what may be the ultimate adjustment of the billions of dollars that are owed to us by foreign nations. I for one voice the hope that regardless of what we may collect of these just debts—and for the sake of our debtors as much as for the sake of our own people the debts should be paid in full—I voice the hope that we may properly utilize our position as the greatest creditor nation the world has ever known to force upon the world such limitation of armament as will ultimately result in the thing for which through the ages men have longed and women have prayed—the abolition of the means of war.

In a general way the domestic problems which are confronting us can be solved largely if we will initiate two major policies—internationally cooperation and good will, nationally a return to the basic conception of our Government with its well-defined principles of State rights.

There is no issue to-day more compelling in its clarion call than that of State rights. Throughout the length and breadth of the land resentment is evident against the constantly increasing bureaucratic powers of Federal Government. This applies not merely to one question; it applies to many. But perhaps its application is more apparent in relation to prohibition than to any other of the various issues that are being widely discussed.

SUBSTITUTE FOR EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

My personal views on the subject of prohibition are, I take it, fairly well known. Because of the conditions that have grown up since the passage of the eighteenth amendment I feel that the eighteenth amendment must give way to some other plan. I would not suggest mere outright repeal without a substitutive formula. Too many of the American people are fearful of the confusion that might in such circumstances arise. But I would, as soon as Congress can be induced to pass it, submit to the States for ratification some alternative scheme that would permit the different States to take over the question of liquor control if, after a referendum of the people of each State, such demand was clearly evidenced by a majority vote. The principle of State rights here applied would meet the exigencies of the situation, and it would seem reasonable that Members of Congress who may personally be opposed to any change in the eighteenth amendment should at least be willing to submit the question to the States for action so that if the requisite number of States ratified a new constitutional provision the right of the individual State to handle this problem in its own way would be justly and properly established.

SENATOR SHEPPARD ON STATE RIGHTS

For such a suggestion there is distinguished precedent. In the debate on the submission of the eighteenth amendment on July 30, 1917, Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas, one of the authors of the amendment, made the following statement:

"The Member of Congress who will not vote for the submission of a constitutional amendment to the decision of the States, where it belongs, unless he personally believes it should become a part of the Constitution, usurps the function of the States, arrogates to himself and the Federal Government a prerogative that belongs to the States and violates the very essence of their sovereignty. * * *

"Were I opposed on principle to nation-wide prohibition, I would vote to submit the amendment to the States in order that they might exercise one of their fundamental rights. An issue is thus presented by the nation-wide amendment entirely independent of prohibition." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 55, pt. 6, 65th Cong., 1st sess., p. 5553.)

The contention of Senator SHEPPARD was well founded. Applying properly as it did to the eighteenth amendment, it applies with equal force to the possible submission of a substitutive provision for which there is widespread demand.

I am not wedded to any particular plan for reform, but I am as everlastingly opposed to the intolerable conditions that have grown up under the present system of attempted prohibition as I was to the conditions that in the old days characterized the saloon system. One real benefit that has come from the eighteenth amendment has been the abolition of the licensed saloon. It must not be allowed to return. But the American people can and will show themselves capable of evolving a substitutive plan which without returning the saloon will handle the liquor problem in a sane and reasonable way.

Immediately I would amend the Volstead Act to permit the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer. From every standpoint, in my opinion, this is desirable, certainly from the standpoint of the fiscal affairs of the Treasury of the United States where an ever-increasing deficit confronts the country.

Unless I am wholly mistaken as to what the younger generation is thinking and feeling it will demand of both political parties a frank and honest statement of position on the prohibition question, and it will favor that party which courageously meets this demand. Not that prohibition is so important that it warps into insignificance other questions of consequence, but because the attitude of political parties and of politicians concerning it is symptomatic of the deceit and expediency which many have come to associate with politics.

ATTEMPTED DICTATION

The suggestions that I make, as stated in the beginning, are merely personal suggestions. Only the Democratic Convention can write the Democratic platform. But may I be permitted to venture the prediction that the platform will be written and the candidate, whoever he may be, will be nominated by those who are Democrats and who have a right to speak as Democrats.

Two weeks ago there was held in Washington a meeting attended by many well-intentioned men and women and a number of paid censors of the public morals. It was a gathering of a body known as the Anti-Saloon League and other forces aligned on the side of what has come to be known as prohibition. In passing, let me say that to me the word "prohibition" is extremely obnoxious—just as obnoxious as the terms "wet" and "dry." Why not substitute the word "temperance"? Until there was placed in the Constitution of the United States police power that sought to regulate the personal habits of the citizenship of America our Nation was progressing rapidly toward temperance, but during the last 12 years I think you will agree that we have forgotten temperance, we have tried to do by law what should be accomplished by moral precept, and the result upon the youth of the land particularly has been unfortunate in the extreme.

We have in America, of course, a secret ballot. It would be impossible, therefore, to say with accuracy who of those who participated in the Washington meeting two weeks ago vote the Democratic ticket. This, however, is undoubtedly true—that a very large number of the most active participants were openly opposed to the Democratic nominees in 1928, have been opposed to Democratic nominees subsequent to 1928 even where the so-called prohibition issue was not involved, and are actively allied with organizations, many of them in the pay of organizations, which are nothing more nor less than recognized adjuncts of the Republican Party.

I have no quarrel with this convocation at Washington. These men and women had a perfect right to assemble. Men and women interested in any subject have the right of peaceful assemblage and free speech in any city of the land. But when this group, which will not support the Democratic ticket in the coming election, no matter who may be its nominee or what its platform; when this group attempts, as it did at every session of its Washington meeting, to dictate to the Democratic Party those whom it may or may not nominate; when it attempts, as it did, to prescribe what may or may not be included in the Democratic platform, I, as an individual Democrat, challenge the right of any such suggestion. I spurn the suggestion, and I say to those assembled at Washington and to their cohorts in whatever section of the country that the Democratic Party will write its platform and will nominate its candidate without reference to the impudent suggestion of those who have no proper part in Democratic councils and who will not support the Democratic ticket. Moreover, I can not fail to wonder and to question how much attention should be paid to the attempted mandates of any gathering which would hold up as a hero and by resolution try to exonerate a man now resting under serious accusation, even indictment by the courts, for his failure properly to account for campaign funds placed in his hands by Republican leaders in 1928 for the purpose of fomenting bigotry and intolerance in the South and in the border States.

But enough of that. The Democrats who assemble at Chicago will go there with serious purpose in view. They will be imbued, first, with the idea of doing what is best for their country; and second, what is best for their party; and their actions at Chicago with reference to both platform and ticket will be characterized by the solemn realization of the grave responsibility that rests upon them.

SPEAKER GARNER'S LEADERSHIP

There is being unfolded now from day to day the picture of what may be expected at the hands of the Democrats if they are vested with power as a result of next November's election. Two months ago one of the most skilled and accomplished legislators who has ever served in the Congress was made Speaker of the House of Representatives. From the day he assumed the duties of that important office, second only to the Presidency itself in its power and influence and significance, he has made a record which, with due regard to other distinguished Speakers, has not been equaled in half a century. With a bare majority of 5 or 6 of his party, the compelling leadership of JOHN GARNER is such that he is putting through with expedition and vigor and intelligence a legislative program of far-reaching value. The Democratic House has not played cheap partisan politics. Where it could accept recommendations of the President it has done so promptly and generously. Where it has felt the necessity of going outside or beyond those recommendations it has the courage to assume responsibility on its own account. What it has accomplished, what it will accomplish, represents to the American people the constructive program and the intelligent administration of affairs that may be confidently anticipated at the hands of a Democratic Executive and a Democratic Congress following the election of 1932.

MISSION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The Democratic Party is more than a hundred and thirty years old. It is the one political party that has survived the vicissitudes of time. For 60 years prior to the Civil War, with only brief exception, its policies were the policies of the State. Temporarily disrupted because of the slavery problem it returned to power in the late seventies and the early eighties to redeem the country from the iniquities of special privilege that characterized tariff legislation and from the corruption that had grown up in public office through the long tenure of Republican rule. Again 20 years ago the Democratic Party was called upon to rescue the country from the intolerable conditions that then prevailed in the Government, conditions that represented deception and dishonesty in dealing with the interests of the people.

To-day there is a call to our party of a consequence as great as any in the past. It has a mission of tremendous importance. With world conditions as they are, with the very capital system itself hanging in the balance, it may be the province of the Democratic Party to prove itself the agency for the preservation of American institutions as we know them.

The Democratic Party is not static. It never has been. It has shown itself capable of moving forward with the urge of new life and new ideas. It has shown itself able to deal with arising problems and pressing needs. It will, I hope and believe, meet constructively and patriotically the grave situation which now menaces our people—perhaps the most threatening in its dire possibilities the Nation has ever been called upon to face. But the Democratic Party can do its duty adequately only if it has the courage to confront the issues that the younger generation is discussing, only if it tries to find the answer to all of the knotty problems that are now so apparent. Otherwise, winning perhaps a temporary victory it will neither be able to remain in power to fulfill the mission that lies so definitely in front of it nor will it deserve so to remain.

In the belief that my party has the capacity and the courage, I call upon you to lend it your countenance and your support, and your help in meeting the issues without equivocation or evasion and in measuring up to the possibilities of usefulness that await.

UNEMPLOYMENT LAW OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the law recently enacted by the State of Wisconsin on the subject of unemployment insurance. It is the first law enacted in this country on that subject.

There being no objection, the law was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAPTER 20, LAWS OF SPECIAL SESSION 1931

An act to create chapter 108, section 20.573, subsection (10) of section 71.03, subsection (10) of section 71.04, and subsection (5) of section 20.57, and to amend subsection (9a) of section 101.10 of the statutes, relating to unemployment reserves and compensation, providing penalties, and making appropriations

The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Legislative intent: (1) The legislature intends through this act to make it certain that by July 1, 1933, at least a majority of the employees of this State will enjoy the protection of fair and adequate systems of unemployment compensation. The largest organization of employers in the State having declared it to be the intention of its members voluntarily to establish unemployment-fund systems, it is the intent of the legislature to give employers a fair opportunity to bring about the purposes of this act without legal compulsion. If, by June 1, 1933, the employers of not less than 175,000 employees have voluntarily established plans which comply with the standards prescribed in section 108.15 of this act, then the compulsory system provided for in section 2 shall not take effect; otherwise, it shall take effect July 1, 1933. Should this provision for any reason be held invalid it is the intent of the legislature that the compulsory plan shall take effect July 1, 1933.

SEC. 2. A new chapter and a new section are added to the statutes to read:

CHAPTER 108

UNEMPLOYMENT RESERVES AND COMPENSATION

108.01. Public-policy declaration. As a guide to the interpretation and application of this chapter the public policy of this State is declared as follows:

(1) Unemployment in Wisconsin has become an urgent public problem, gravely affecting the health, morals, and welfare of the people of this State. The burden of irregular employment now falls directly and with crushing force on the unemployed worker and his family and results also in an excessive drain on agencies for private charity and for public relief. The decreased and irregular purchasing power of wage earners in turn vitally affects the livelihood of farmers, merchants, and manufacturers, results in a decreased demand for their products, and thus tends partially to paralyze the economic life of the entire State. In good times and in bad times unemployment is a heavy social cost, now paid mainly by wage earners. Industrial and business units in Wisconsin should pay at least a part of this social cost, caused by their own irregular operations. To assure somewhat steadier work and wages to its own employees a company can reasonably be required to build up a limited reserve for unemployment, and out of this to pay unemployment benefits to its workers, based on their wages and lengths of service.

(2) The economic burdens resulting from unemployment should not only be shared more fairly but should also be decreased and prevented as far as possible. A sound system of unemployment reserves, contributions, and benefits should induce and reward steady operations by each employer, since he is in a better position than any other agency to share in and to reduce the social costs of his own irregular employment. Employers and employees throughout the State should cooperate, in advisory committees under Government supervision, to promote and encourage the steadiest possible employment. A more adequate system of free public employment offices should be provided, at the expense of employers, to place workers more efficiently and to shorten the periods between jobs. Education and retraining of workers during their unemployment should be encouraged. Governmental construction providing emergency relief through work and wages should be stimulated.

(3) A gradual and constructive solution of the unemployment problem along these lines has become an imperative public need.

108.2. Definitions: As used in this chapter—

(a) "Commission" shall mean the industrial commission.

(b) "Workmen's compensation act" shall mean sections 102.01 to 102.35.

(c) "Employee," except where the context clearly shows otherwise, shall mean any person who is employed by an employer and in an employment subject to this chapter, or who has been so employed within the last six months; provided, that an independent contractor shall be deemed an "employer," and that all persons employed by subcontractors under him shall be deemed his "employees" for the purposes of this chapter.

(d) "Employer," except where the context clearly shows otherwise, shall mean any person, partnership, association, corporation (or legal representative of a deceased person, or a receiver or trustee of a person, partnership, association or corporation), including this State and any municipal corporation or other political subdivision thereof, who or whose predecessor in interest has for four months or more within the preceding calendar year employed 10 or more persons in employments subject to this chapter. There shall be included in such calculation all persons thus employed by the employer throughout the entire State, and all of the several places of employment maintained within Wisconsin by the employer shall be treated as a single "employer" for the purposes of this chapter; provided, moreover, that where any employer, either directly or through a holding company or otherwise, has a majority control or ownership of otherwise separate business enterprises employing persons in Wisconsin, all such enterprises shall be treated as a single "employer" for the purposes of this chapter.

(e) An "employment," except where the context shows otherwise, shall mean any employment, during any week, in which all or the greater part of the person's work is performed within Wisconsin, under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, including all contracts entered into by helpers and assistants of employees, whether paid by employer or employee, if employed with the knowledge actual or constructive of the employer; except that for the purposes of this chapter an "employment" shall not include:

1. Employment as a farm laborer:

2. Employment in the personal or domestic service of an employer at his home;

3. Employment on a governmental unemployment relief project, approved as such by the commission;

4. Employment as an elected or appointed public officer;

5. Employment by a governmental unit on an annual salary basis;

6. Employment as a teacher in a private or public school, college, or university for the regular term for which such school, college, or university is in session;

7. Employment of a person who is unable or unwilling to work normal full time and who, before accepting a part-time job, has registered at his district public employment office as a part-time worker, in such written form as the commission may prescribe: Provided, however, That for the purposes of this chapter no person shall be treated as a part-time worker who customarily works half or more than half the full-time hours per week which prevail in such establishment for full-time employees;

8. Employment by railroads engaged in interstate transportation and employment in logging operations.

(f) An employee's "weeks of employment" by an employer shall mean all those weeks during each of which the employee has performed any services at all for the employer.

(g) "Benefits" shall mean the money allowance payable to an employee as compensation for his wage losses due to unemployment as provided in this chapter.

(h) "Wages" shall mean what is customarily meant by the term, except that it shall include bonuses and the reasonable value of board, rent, housing, lodging, or similar advantage received from the employer.

(i) An employer's "full-time hours per week" shall be determined for each general class of his employees (classifying together all those usually employed on substantially the same schedule of weekly hours). The commission shall calculate an employer's full-time hours per week, applicable to all his employees of the given class, by averaging the weekly hours worked by the majority of such employees for each week during the preceding calendar year in which such prevailing hours were 40 or more; provided, that in cases where it finds that the above method can not reasonably and fairly be applied the commission may adopt such other comparable method or methods of determining an employer's full-time hours per week as it deems reasonable and suitable under this chapter.

(j) An employee's "average weekly wage" shall mean the weekly earnings such employee would average from the particular employer if employed that number of full-time hours per week of such employer which is applicable to such employee. Accordingly, each employee's "average weekly wage" shall be calculated by multiplying such applicable full-time hours per week by the employee's average earnings per hour from such employer. Each employee's earnings per hour (averaged for 100 or more hours of employment, so far as possible) shall for this purpose be calculated at such times and in such manner and in accordance with such suitable rules as the commission may prescribe with a view to determining benefits under this chapter.

(k) "Fund" shall mean the unemployment reserve fund established in section 108.16.

(l) "Employer's account" shall mean the separate unemployment reserve account of an employer with the above fund.

(m) "Reserve per employee" shall refer to the status of an employer's account at the beginning of a calendar month. It shall be calculated by dividing the net amount such employer's account then has (or would have if all contributions due under this chapter had been paid) by the maximum number of employees subject to this chapter employed by such employer in any week during the preceding six months.

(n) "Administration fund" shall mean the fund established in section 108.20.

108.03. Payment of benefits: (1) Benefits shall be paid by the commission to each unemployed employee from his employer's account in the fund under the conditions and in the amounts stated in this chapter, except that employers exempted under subsection (2) of section 108.15 shall pay benefits directly to their unemployed employees under the conditions and in the amounts stated in the plan approved by the commission as the basis for the exemption.

(2) No benefits shall become payable from any employer's account, nor shall any employer's benefit liability begin to accrue under section 108.06, until one year after he has begun to make the regular and continuing contributions required of him under this chapter, except as otherwise provided in subsection (5) of section 108.15 and subsection (8) of section 108.16; provided, that at the end of such year period each employer's benefit liability shall begin to accrue and benefits shall accordingly become payable from his account.

(3) The commission shall determine or approve the time and method of payment of benefits.

108.04. Eligibility for benefits: (1) No employee shall be deemed eligible for benefits for partial or total unemployment unless he gives the notification of such unemployment required under subsection (1) of section 108.08, or unless such notification is waived by the commission in accordance with such section.

(2) No employee shall be deemed eligible for benefits on account of either partial or total unemployment during any calendar week unless such employee was physically able to work and available for work whenever with due notice called on by his employer to report for work. Nor shall any employee be deemed eligible for benefits for total unemployment for any calendar week in which he has suitable employment, as defined in subsection (6) of this section; provided that nothing in this section shall render an employee ineligible for total unemployment benefits for any calendar week on the ground that such employee is employed on a governmental unemployment-relief project under section 108.25.

(3) An employee shall be deemed partially unemployed in any calendar week and shall at once be eligible for benefits for such partial unemployment whenever his week's wages are less than the amount of weekly benefit to which he would be entitled under this chapter if totally unemployed.

(4) An employee shall be deemed totally unemployed in any calendar week when he performs no services whatsoever for his current employer during such week. An employee thus unemployed shall be eligible for benefits for total unemployment for each week of total unemployment occurring subsequent to a waiting period of two such weeks. No benefit shall be or become payable for this required waiting period, but not more than two such weeks of waiting period per employer shall be required of any employee in any 12 months in order to establish his eligibility for total unemployment benefits under this section. The commission may approve in an approved voluntary unemployment benefit plan such longer or shorter waiting period as will comply with the requirements of subsection (2) of section 108.15.

(5) An employee shall not be deemed eligible for any benefits for total unemployment based on his past weeks of employment, and no such benefits shall be payable to the employee under any of the following conditions:

(a) If he has lost his employment through misconduct;

(b) If he has left his employment voluntarily without good cause attributable to the employer;

(c) During any period for which he has left and is out of employment because of a trade dispute still in active progress in the establishment in which he was employed;

(d) For any period during which he is out of employment because of an act of God affecting his place of employment;

(e) If he has received in wages $1,500 or more during the 12 months preceding the date on which he became totally unemployed;

(f) If he is ordinarily self-employed, but has been temporarily (for not more than five months) employed in an employment subject to this chapter and can, at the termination of such temporary employment, reasonably return to his self-employment;

(g) If he attended a school, college, or university in the last preceding school term, and has been employed by his employer only during the customary summer vacation of schools, colleges, and universities.

(6) A claimant shall no longer be eligible for total unemployment benefits and the liability of his past employers to pay him such benefits based on his past employment shall cease for any period after he has, without good cause, refused to accept suitable employment when offered to him, or has failed to apply for suitable employment when notified by the district public employment office. Suitable employment shall mean either employment in his usual employment or other employment for which he is reasonably fitted, regardless of whether it is subject to this chapter, provided such employment is in the vicinity of his residence or last employment and gives him wages at least equal to his weekly benefit for total unemployment or provides him work for at least half the number of hours normally worked as full time in such occupation or establishment; and provided further, that whenever in any specific case the commission finds that it is impracticable to apply any of the foregoing standards, the commission may apply any standard reasonably calculated to determine what is suitable employment.

(7) Nothing in this section shall require an employee to accept employment; nor shall any employee forfeit his right to benefits by refusing to accept employment under either or both of the following conditions:

(a) In a situation vacant in consequence of a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute.

(b) If the wages, hours, and conditions offered be not those prevailing for similar work in the locality or are such as tend to depress wages and working conditions.

(8) No employee shall be deemed eligible to receive benefits under this chapter on account of any period of partial or total unemployment unless such employee has been a resident of Wisconsin for the two years preceding the beginning of such period of unemployment or has been gainfully employed in the State for 40 weeks within such 2-year period; provided, that an employee's ineligibility under this subsection shall modify his employer's benefit liability only as specifically provided in subsection (5) of section 108.06.

108.05. Amount of benefits: (1) Each eligible employee shall be paid benefits for total unemployment at a rate of $10 a week, or 50 per cent of his average weekly wage, whichever is lower; except that when 50 per cent of such wage is less than $5 a benefit of $5 a week shall be paid.

(2) The benefit payable for partial unemployment in any week shall be the difference between the eligible employee's actual wages for the week and the weekly benefit to which he would be entitled if totally unemployed.

(3) Benefits shall be paid to each employee for the calendar weeks during which he is totally or partially unemployed and eligible for benefits; but no employee shall ever receive in any calendar year more than 10 weeks of benefit for total unemployment nor more than an equivalent total amount of benefits either for partial unemployment or for partial and total unemployment combined.

(4) The amount of benefits payable to any eligible employee shall be limited also by the benefit liability of his employer's account, as provided in sections 108.06 and 108.07.

108.06. Benefit liability of employer's account: (1) An employer's account shall be liable to pay benefits to an employee in the ratio of 1 week of total unemployment benefit (or an equivalent amount of partial unemployment benefit) to each 4 weeks of employment of such employee by such employer within the 52 weeks preceding the date on which such employee last performed services for such employer. But no liability for the payment of benefits to an employee shall accrue unless the employee has been employed more than two weeks by the particular employer within such preceding year, or in the case of an employee employed on a fixed monthly salary unless the employee has been employed more than one month by the particular employer within such preceding year.

(2) In no case shall an employer's account remain or be liable to pay benefits to an employee for any unemployment occurring more than six months after the date on which such employee last performed services for such employer.

(3) No employer's account shall at any time be liable to pay benefits beyond the current resources his account has or would have if all contributions due under this chapter had been paid.

(4) The liability of any employer's account to pay benefits for weeks of partial or total unemployment occurring within or mainly within any calendar month may be reduced, depending on the adequacy of such account at the beginning of such month. Such adequacy shall be determined at the beginning of each month on the basis of the net reserve per employee which the employer's account then has or would have if all contributions due for payment under this chapter have been paid. (Whenever during any month the maximum benefit payable from an employer's account for any week of total unemployment is reduced hereunder, this reduced maximum shall also be observed in calculating the benefits payable from that account for partial unemployment during that month.) In each calendar month an employer's account shall be liable to pay the benefits otherwise due his eligible employees for their weeks of unemployment occurring within such month only in accordance with the following schedule:

(a) When its reserve at the beginning of the month amounts to $50 or more per employee the account shall be liable for and shall pay in full all valid benefit claims for unemployment during the month.

(b) When such reserve amounts to over $45 but less than $50, all such valid benefit claims shall be paid, except that no eligible claimant shall receive for total unemployment a benefit of more than $9 per week.

(c) When such reserve amounts to over $40 but less than $45 dollars no claimant shall receive a benefit of more than $8 per week.

(d) For each further periodic drop of $5 in the reserve per employee there shall be a corresponding further drop of $1 in the maximum benefit per week payable to any claimant for total unemployment.

(5) Any employee who has neither been a resident of Wisconsin for the past two years nor been gainfully employed in the State for 40 weeks within such 2-year period, and who is, therefore, under subsection (8) of section 108.04 ineligible to receive benefits under this chapter, shall be known as "a nonqualified employee." Whenever such a nonqualified employee loses his employment, under conditions other than those enumerated in subsection (5) of section 108.04, his employer's account shall be at once liable to pay in lieu of benefits to such person a lump-sum amount to the commission. This payment shall be made at the rate of $5 for each four weeks of employment of such person by such employer during the period of employment just ended; but not more than $5 shall be so payable for each $5 reserve per employee in the employer's account at the beginning of the current calendar month. The employer's liability under this subsection shall be reported by him and shall be determined in amount in accordance with suitable rules to be prescribed by the commission. The amount found to be due shall in each such case be paid over from the employer's account into the administration fund established by section 108.20.

108.07. Liability of successive employers: (1) When an employee is employed by more than one employer within any 12-month period, the payment of benefits due such employee for total unemployment shall be made from the successive employer's accounts in inverse order to such successive employments. Until the last employer liable shall have met or been unable further to meet his benefit liability to an eligible employee no previous employer shall be due to pay benefits to such employee.

(2) When an eligible employee becomes employed in an employment or by an employer not subject to this chapter, such employment, except as provided in section 108.25, shall postpone but not terminate the liability of any former employer to pay benefits to such employee: Provided, however, That if the employee fails to return to regular work offered him in his former employment by the written request of his former employer, made in good faith and not inconsistent with subsection (7) of section 108.04, such employee's right to benefits from such former employer shall be extinguished.

108.08. Notification: (1) Any claimant of benefits must give notice of his unemployment at the public employment office for the district in which he is or was last employed, within such time and in accordance with such rules as the commission may prescribe. Thereafter he shall give notice of the continuance of his unemployment as frequently and in such manner as the commission may prescribe. But the notification prescribed under this subsection may, as to any case or class of cases, be waived by the commission for good cause (including administrative feasibility), provided the commission finds that no party in interest will be prejudiced by such waiver.

(2) The commission may require from any or each employer notification of the partial or total unemployment of his employees within such time, in such form, and in accordance with such rules as the commission may prescribe.

108.09. Establishment of claims: (1) Claims for benefits shall be filed with the superintendent of the public employment office for the district in which the claimant is or was last employed, or with a deputy of the commission designated for the purpose. Claims shall be filed within such time and in such manner as the rules of the commission may prescribe.

(2) If a claim appears to the superintendent or deputy invalid, he shall reject the claim; if it appears valid, he shall state the amount of benefits apparently payable to the claimant while eligible. In either case he shall notify the claimant in writing, giving his reasons. If the claimant is dissatisfied, he may within a time limit after notification to be set by the commission have recourse to the method set up in section 108.10 for settling disputed claims.

(3) If a claim appears to the superintendent or deputy valid, he shall notify the liable employer in writing of the amount of benefits apparently payable thereunder. If the employer does not contest the claim within a time limit after notification to be set by the commission, the amount of benefits stated by the superintendent or deputy shall, subject to the limitations set up in this chapter, become payable to the claimant from such employer's account and shall be so paid by the commission. If the employer wishes to contest the claim, he may, within a time limit to be set by the commission, have recourse to the method set up in section 108.10 for settling disputed claims.

108.10. Method of settling disputed claims: (1) The manner in which disputed claims shall be presented, the reports thereon required from employers, and the conduct of hearings shall be governed by rules and regulations to be adopted by the industrial commission.

(2) Disputed claims, whether involving employers exempted under section 108.15 or those contributing to the fund, shall be decided in the first instance by the superintendent of the district public employment office or by a deputy of the commission designated for the purpose.

(3) Within a time limit after notification to be set by the commission, either the employer or employee may take an appeal from any decision of the superintendent or deputy, to an appeal board to be appointed in each employment-office district by the industrial commission. Such district appeal board shall consist of 1 employer or representative of employers, 1 employee or representative of employees, and 1 person who is not an employer, employee, or representative of either.

(4) Decisions of a district appeal board shall be reviewable by the commission or its representative upon appeal of either party within a time limit and in accordance with other rules and regulations to be laid down by the commission. The commission may authorize a commissioner or an examiner to hear such cases and to make decisions under rules to be adopted by the commission.

(5) Either party, if dissatisfied with the decision of such commissioner or examiner, may petition the industrial commission to review it as a commission. Such petition shall be in writing, specifying in detail the particular errors alleged. If no such petition is filed within 10 days from the date when a copy of the decision of the commissioner or examiner was mailed to the last known address of each party in interest, such decision shall be considered the decision of the industrial commission, unless set aside, reversed, or modified by such commissioner or examiner within such time. Within 10 days after the filing of any such petition the commission shall, on the basis of the evidence previously submitted in such case, affirm, reverse, set aside, or modify such decision, or direct the taking of additional testimony. Any decision made by the commission shall, if not modified or changed by it within 20 days, become the final decision of the commission, and shall then be subject to judicial review on the same grounds and in the same manner as decisions of the industrial commission under the workmen's compensation act may be reviewed.

(6) The commission shall have the power to remove or transfer the proceedings pending before a commissioner or examiner, and may on its own motion set aside, modify, or change any decision, whether made by a superintendent or deputy, by a district appeal board, by a commissioner or examiner, or by the commission as a body, at any time within 20 days of the date thereof, if it shall discover any mistake therein or upon the grounds of newly discovered evidence.

(7) In the discharge of their duties under this section the superintendent of any district public-employment office, any member of a district appeal board, and any member, examiner, or duly authorized employee of the industrial commission shall have power to administer oaths to persons appearing before them, and by subpœnas (served in the manner in which circuit court subpœnas are served) to compel attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, documents, and records necessary or convenient to be used by them in connection with any disputed claim.

(8) A full and complete record shall be kept of all proceedings in connection with a disputed claim, and all testimony shall be taken down by a stenographer appointed by the commission.

108.101. Modified procedure: The commission may modify the procedure prescribed in sections 108.08, 108.09, and 108.10, with a view to such establishment and determination of claims against employers exempted under section 108.15, as will be suitable to such cases and fair to the parties in interest.

108.11. Agreement to contribute by employees void: (1) No agreement by an employee or by employees to pay any portion of the contributions required under this chapter from employers shall be valid. No employer shall make a deduction for such purpose from wages. Any employee claiming a violation of this provision may, to recover wage deductions wrongfully made, have recourse to the method set up in section 108.10 for settling disputed claims.

(2) But nothing in this chapter shall affect the validity of voluntary arrangements whereby employees freely agree to make contributions to a fund for the purpose of securing unemployment compensation additional to the benefits provided in this chapter.

108.12. Waiver of benefit void: No agreement by an employee to waive his rights to benefits or any other rights under this chapter shall be valid.

108.13. Assignment: No claim for benefit under this chapter or under any approved voluntary unemployment benefit plan shall be assignable before payment, but this provision shall not affect the survival thereof; nor shall any claim for benefit awarded, adjudged, or paid be subject to be taken for the debts of the party entitled thereto.

108.14. Administration: (1) This chapter shall be administered by the industrial commission.

(2) The commission shall have power and authority to adopt and enforce all rules and regulations which it finds necessary or suitable to carry out the provisions of this chapter. All such rules and regulations shall be published in the State's official newspaper and shall take effect 10 days after such publication. A copy of such rules and regulations shall be delivered to every person making application therefor. The commission may require from employers, whether subject to this chapter or not, any reports on employment, wages, hours, and related matters which it deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this chapter.

(3) The commission may appoint, employ, and pay as many persons as it deems necessary to administer and to carry out the purposes of this chapter, and may make all other expenditures of any kind which it deems necessary or suitable to this end. But it shall not pay to any member of a district appeal board more than $5 of compensation per day of services.

(4) The commission may create as many employment districts and district appeal boards and may establish and maintain as many free public employment offices as it deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this chapter. The commission shall have power to finance either partly or completely such public employment offices as it deems necessary under this chapter from the funds appropriated to the commission for its expenses under this chapter, whether or not the political subdivision in which such office is located agrees to pay or does pay any part of the expenses of such office.

(5) The commission shall appoint advisory employment committees, by local districts or by industries or for the whole State, consisting in each case of one or more representatives each of employers, employees, and the public, who shall assist the commission, without compensation but with reimbursement of necessary expenses, in administering and carrying out the purposes and provisions of this chapter.

(6) It shall be one of the purposes of this chapter to promote the regularization of employment in enterprises, localities, industries, and the State. The commission, with the advice and aid of its advisory employment committees, shall take all appropriate steps within its means to reduce and prevent unemployment. To this end the commission may employ experts, and may carry on and publish the results of any investigations and research which it deems relevant, whether or not directly related to the other purposes and specific provisions of this chapter. At least once a year the commission shall compile and publish a summary report stating the operations and status of each employer's account or other unemployment reserve and covering such other material as it deems significant in connection with the operations and purposes of this chapter.

108.15. Exemption: (1) The commission shall exempt from the provisions of this chapter, except sections 108.12, 108.14, 108.15, 108.19, 108.21, 108.22, and 108.24, any employer who guarantees, under a plan approved by the commission, to all his eligible employees (and to each new eligible employee who is continued in employment after a probationary period of 1 month), in advance for a stated 1-year period, at least 42 weeks of work or wages, for at least 36 hours in each such week, if satisfied that the employer can and will make good such promise under all circumstances. The words "eligible employee" in this subsection shall mean an employee who, if unemployed, would not be barred from eligibility for benefits by any of paragraphs (e), (f), and (g) of subsection (5) of section 108.04 or by subsection (8) of section 108.04. But such employer shall not be required to make good such guaranty in the case of any individual employee who loses his employment under any of the conditions enumerated in subsection (5) of section 108.04.

(2) The commission shall exempt from the provisions of this chapter, except sections 108.03, 108.04, 108.07, 108.101, 108.12, 108.13, 108.14, 108.15, 108.19, 108.21, 108.22, 108.23, 108.24, 108.25, and 108.26, any employer or group of employers submitting a plan for unemployment benefits which the commission finds (a) makes eligible for benefits at least the employees who would be eligible for benefits under the compulsory features of this act; (b) provides that the proportion of the benefits to be financed by the employer or employers will on the whole be equal to or greater than the benefits which would be provided under the compulsory features of this act; and (c) is, on the whole, as beneficial in all other respects to such employees as the compulsory plan provided in this act. If under such a plan any contributions are made by employees, the accounts of the plan shall be so kept as to make clear what proportion of the benefits is financed by the employer or employers and what proportion by the employees. If under such a plan any contributions are made by employees the commission may require that such employees be represented, by representatives of their own choosing, in the direct administration of such plan, and the commission may take any steps necessary and appropriate to assure such representation to contributing employees.

(3) No employer or group of employers exempted under this section shall be permitted to insure the liability to pay benefits or wages in any insurance company; and if such employer or employers enters or enter into an agreement for any form of insurance coverage such action shall automatically operate as a revocation of such exemption.

(4) As a condition of granting exemption the commission may require the employer or group to furnish such security as the commission may deem sufficient to assure payment of all promised benefits or wages, including the setting up of proper reserves. Such reserves and other security, and also the manner in which an exempted employer carries out his promises of benefits or employment shall be subject to inspection and investigation by the commission at any reasonable time. If the commission shall deem it necessary, it may require an exempted employer to furnish additional security to assure fulfillment of his promises to his employees.

(5) If an exempted employer or group of employers fails to furnish security satisfactory to the commission, or fails to fulfill the promises made to employees, or willfully fails to furnish any reports that the commission may require under this chapter, or otherwise to comply with the applicable portions of this chapter and the rules, regulations, and orders of the commission pertaining to the administration thereof, the commission may, upon 10 days' notice and the opportunity to be heard, revoke the exemption of such employer or group. In such case or in case any exempted employer or group voluntarily terminates exemption, such employer or each of such group of employers shall at once pay into the fund an amount equal to the balance which would have been standing to his account had he been making the contributions to the fund and paying out the benefits provided in this chapter; provided that in any case where such balance can not reasonably and definitely be determined, and specifically in the case of an employer exempted under subsection (1) of this section, the commission may require such employer to meet his liability under the present subsection by paying into the fund a lump-sum amount equal to the contributions he would, if not exempted, have paid into the fund under section 108.18 during the 12 months preceding termination of his exemption. The account of any employer whose exemption has been terminated shall thenceforth be liable to pay to his employees the benefits which may remain or thereafter become due them, as if such employer had not been exempted under this section; and such employer shall thenceforth pay all contributions regularly required under this chapter from nonexempted employers.

(6) Each employer exempted under this section shall be liable to make all contributions, to pay directly to employees all benefits, to pay all penalties, and otherwise to comply with all the provisions of this chapter, except as specifically provided in this section and in suitable rules to be formulated by the commission consistent with the purposes and provisions of this chapter.

(7) Such plan shall provide that upon the going out of business in this State by any employer, or the legal abandonment of the plan, the funds which shall have been contributed under such plan shall be retained for a sufficient period to meet all liability for benefits which may thereafter accrue, and that at the end of such period the proportion then remaining of employer contributions shall be released to the employer or his assigns and the proportion then remaining of employee contributions shall be distributed in such equitable manner as the commission may approve.

(8) The rules and regulations for the government of such plan must be submitted to and approved by the commission. A plan, so approved, shall, when put into effect, constitute a contract between each employer and every other employer participating in that plan and between the employer or employers, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, all employees who come under it, and shall not thereafter be abandoned or modified without the approval of the commission; provided, that at any time after five years from and after the passage of this act the commission may, on the petition of any interested party or on its own motion, and after public hearing, modify any such plan to conform to the standards then provided by the law for approved voluntary unemployment-benefit plans.

108.16. Unemployment reserve fund: (1) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this chapter there is established a fund to be known as the "unemployment reserve fund," to be administered by the State without liability on the part of the State beyond the amount of the fund. This fund shall consist of all contributions and moneys paid into and received by the fund pursuant to this chapter and of properties and securities acquired by and through the use of moneys belonging to the fund.

(2) A separate account shall be kept by the industrial commission with each employer contributing to said fund, and this separate employer's account shall never be merged with any other account except as provided in subsection (3) of this section.

(3) Whenever two or more employers in the same industry or locality desire to pool their several accounts with the fund with a view to regularizing their employment by cooperative activity, they may file with the commission a written application to merge their several accounts in a new joint account with the fund. If in its judgment the plan has merit, the commission shall establish such a joint account, provided that the several employers each accept such suitable rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this chapter as may be drawn up by the commission with reference to the conduct and dissolution of such joint accounts.

(4) All contributions payable to the unemployment reserve fund shall be paid to the industrial commission, and shall daily be paid over by the commission to the State treasurer and credited to the unemployment reserve fund. Payments from said fund shall be made upon vouchers of the industrial commission. The State treasurer shall be ex officio the treasurer and custodian of the unemployment reserve fund. He shall give a separate and additional bond conditioned upon his faithful performance of these duties in such amount as may be recommended by the industrial commission and fixed by the governor. All premiums upon the bond required pursuant to this section when furnished by an authorized surety company or by a duly constituted governmental bonding fund shall be paid from the interest earnings of the unemployment reserve fund.

(5) The unemployment reserve fund shall be invested by the annuity and investment board in the readily marketable obligations of the United States of America, of any of its 48 State governments, including this State, and of any city, county, or other governmental subdivision of this State, all having a maturity of not over five years from the date of purchase. The investments of the fund shall be so made that all the assets of the fund shall always be readily convertible into cash when needed. When so directed by the industrial commission the board shall dispose of securities belonging to the fund to secure cash needed for the payment of benefits. All expenses of the annuity and investment board in the investment of the unemployment reserve fund shall be paid from the interest earnings of said fund, as provided in subsection (1) of section 20.725.

(6) All net earnings on moneys belonging to the unemployment reserve fund shall be credited thereto, and shall at the close of each fiscal year be apportioned by the commission equitably to the several employers' accounts.

(7) If any employer shall become exempted under section 108.15 or shall cease to be subject to this chapter, or shall permanently go out of business in this State (except as provided in subsection (8) of this section), such employer shall, upon the expiration of six months (or prior thereto if he shall furnish surety satisfactory to the commission for the payment of benefits becoming due under this chapter during the remainder of such 6-month period), receive the balance then standing to his credit in the fund.

(8) If any employer shall transfer his business in whole or in part or shall otherwise reorganize such business, the successor in interest is hereby required to take over (in proportion to the extent of such transfer, as determined for the purposes of this chapter by the commission) the resources and liabilities of such employer's account, and to continue without interruption the payment of all contributions and benefits which would have been due for payment under this chapter in case such employer had continued in business without such transfer or reorganization.

108.17. Payment of contributions: (1) On and after the 1st day of July, 1933, contributions shall accrue and shall become payable by each employer then subject to this chapter in accordance with its provisions. Thereafter contributions shall accrue and become payable by any employer on and after the date on which he becomes newly subject to this chapter.

(2) All contributions required under this chapter from employers shall be paid to the industrial commission, at such times and in such manner as the commission may prescribe, except as provided otherwise in the case of employers exempted under section 108.15.

108.18. Contributions to the unemployment reserve fund: The contribution regularly payable by each employer into his account with the fund shall be an amount equal to 2 per cent per annum of his pay roll. (In order that reserves shall be built up for all employees potentially eligible to benefits, "pay roll" shall include all wages, salaries, and remuneration paid to employees subject to this chapter; except that it shall not include the amount paid to an employee or officer employed on a contractual basis for a fixed period at a fixed monthly salary which will aggregate at least $1,500 if said period is less than 12 months, or amount to at least $1,500 dollars per annum if such period is 12 months or more, provided such contract is duly reported to the commission by the employer; nor shall it include any salary or wage of $300 or more per month.) During an employer's first two years of contribution payments, and whenever thereafter his account amounts to less than $55 reserve per employee, the employer shall make contributions to the fund at the rate of 2 per cent per annum on his pay roll. If the employer has been continuously subject to this chapter during the two preceding years, the rate of contributions may be reduced or suspended under the following conditions:

(1) Whenever the employer's account amounts to $55 but less than $75 reserve per employee, such employer shall pay contributions to the fund at the rate of 1 per cent per annum on his pay roll.

(2) Whenever and while the employer's account has a reserve per employee of $75 or more, no contributions to the unemployment reserve fund shall be required of such employer.

108.19. Contributions to the administration fund: Each employer subject to this chapter, including every employer exempted under section 108.15, shall regularly contribute to the unemployment administration fund created in section 108.20 at the rate of 0.2 of 1 per cent per annum on his pay roll as defined in section 108.18. But the commission may prescribe at the close of any fiscal year such lower rates of contribution under this section to apply to classes of employers throughout the ensuing fiscal year, as will in the commission's judgment adequately finance the administration of this chapter, and as will in the commission's judgment fairly represent the relative cost of the services rendered by the commission to each such class.

108.20. Unemployment administration fund and appropriation: (1) To finance the administration of this chapter and to carry out its provisions and purposes there is established the "unemployment administration fund." This fund shall consist of all contributions and moneys paid to the industrial commission for the administration fund as provided in subsection (5) of section 108.06, and in sections 108.19 and 108.22.

(2) All amounts received by the commission for such fund shall daily be paid over to the State treasurer and credited to the unemployment administration fund, and, as provided in section 20.573 of the statutes, are appropriated to the commission for the administration of this chapter.

108.21. Record and audit of pay rolls: Every employer, whether exempted or not, shall keep a true and accurate employment record of all his employees, whether qualified and eligible to unemployment benefits or not, and of the hours worked for him by each and of the wages paid by him to each employee, and shall furnish to the commission upon demand a sworn statement of the same. Such record shall be open to inspection by the commission or its authorized representatives at any reasonable time.

108.22. Collection of contributions in case of default: If any employer, whether exempted or not, shall default in any payment required of him under this chapter, he shall become additionally liable for interest on such payment at 12 per cent per annum from the date such payment became due, such interest to be paid to the administration fund. If after due notice this payment plus interest at 12 per cent per annum is not made, it shall be collected by a civil action in the name of the State, the defaulting employer to pay the costs of such action. The payment originally due shall be paid to the commission, and credited, as may be proper in each case, either to the fund and to the defaulting employer's account or to the administration fund. The interest thus collected shall be paid to the administration fund.

108.23. Bankruptcy: In the event of bankruptcy or insolvency of any employer, unpaid claims for benefits and unpaid amounts due the fund under this chapter or to a fund or reserve under any approved voluntary unemployment benefit plan shall have the same preference as is accorded in subsection (1) of section 102.28 to unpaid claims for compensation or compensation insurance.

108.24. Penalties: (1) Any person who willfully makes a false statement or representation to obtain any benefit or payment under the provisions of this chapter, either for himself or for any other person, or to lower any contribution required of him, and any employer who makes a deduction from the wages of any employee in order to pay any portion of the contribution required of such employer under this chapter, shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment in the county jail not longer than 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and each such false statement and each such deduction from wages shall constitute a separate and distinct offense.

(2) Any employer who willfully refuses or fails to pay any contribution required of him under this chapter, and any person who willfully and unlawfully fails or neglects to appear or to testify or to produce books, papers, and records as required at any hearing under this chapter, shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not less than $25 nor more than $100, or be imprisoned in the county jail not longer than 30 days, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment; and every day of such refusal, failure, or neglect shall constitute a separate and distinct offense.

(3) On complaint of the commission the fines specified in this section may be collected by the State in an action for debt.

108.25. Use of unemployment reserve for public works: (1) If the State or any of its political subdivisions during a period of unemployment, either directly or through a contractor provides work which, in the opinion of the commission, is an unemployment-relief measure, and which conforms to standards of wages and conditions prescribed by the commission, such work shall be deemed suitable employment within the meaning and subject to the limitations of subsection (6) of section 108.04: Provided, That an employee who accepts such work for any calendar week in which he would otherwise be totally unemployed and eligible for benefits shall be entitled to receive such benefits in the form of wages paid him for such governmental work. To this end the State or subdivision giving such work and wages to such employee in any calendar week shall receive his benefits for such week, for the purpose of partially financing such employee's work and wages on such governmental unemployment-relief project.

(2) Benefits payable under this section to an employee in the form of wages from this State or a political subdivision for work on a relief project shall cease, as provided in subsection (6) of section 108.04, for any period after such employee has without good cause failed to apply for suitable employment other than such governmental work when notified, or has refused to accept suitable employment other than such governmental work when offered him.

108.26. Vocational education: When any employee is unemployed and eligible for benefits under this chapter, he may be recommended by the superintendent of the district employment office to attend vocational or other school during his unemployment. If he attends school under conditions approved by such superintendent and does satisfactory work in his classes, he shall be eligible for an additional benefit of $1 per week, to be paid from the administration fund. The education shall be furnished at public expense and any fee which may customarily be charged for attendance at such classes must be paid by the town, village, or city in which such employee resides.

108.27. Separability of provisions: If any provision of this chapter, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid the remainder of the chapter and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

20.573. Unemployment administration fund: All moneys paid to the industrial commission and deposited by it with the State treasurer pursuant to section 108.20 are appropriated to the industrial commission for the performance of the functions of the commission under chapter 108, including its conduct of public employment offices and its other efforts to regularize employment; to pay the compensation and expenses of appeal boards and the expenses of advisory employment committees; and to pay allowances stimulating education during unemployment. Any balance remaining in this fund at the close of any fiscal year shall not lapse but shall remain available for the purposes herein specified.

SEC. 3. Voluntary systems of unemployment compensation: (1) In accordance with the legislative intent expressed in section 1 the compulsory features of section 2 and section 5 of this act shall not take effect until July 1, 1933, nor shall they take effect on that date if the commission finds that on or before June 1, 1933, employers then employing in the aggregate at least 175,000 employees as defined in section 108.02 shall have established plans previously approved by the commission as plans which would be entitled to exemption under section 108.15 of the compulsory act.

(2) At any time after the taking effect of this act employers may submit to the industrial commission voluntary plans for guaranteed employment or for unemployment compensation. If, after investigation, the commission is satisfied that a plan thus submitted would be entitled to exemption under section 108.15 of the compulsory act, the commission shall give its written approval of such plan, and such approval shall apply for the purposes of the present section of this act.

(3) As soon as possible after June 1, 1933, and not later than June 15, 1933, the industrial commission shall make a finding of fact whether or not employers employing (as of June 1, 1933) in the aggregate at least 175,000 employees as defined in section 108.02, have established on or before June 1, 1933, plans previously approved by the commission as plans which would be entitled to exemption under section 108.15 of the compulsory act. The commission shall file such finding with the secretary of state. Such finding of fact by the industrial commission shall be conclusive. In accordance with such finding and in accordance with subsection (1) of the present section the secretary of state shall give notice through publication in the official State paper of the taking effect or otherwise of the compulsory features of section 2 and section 5 of this act.

(5) If the compulsory plan shall not come into operation, the industrial commission shall continue its supervision over the voluntary plans of unemployment compensation established in this State. It shall be the duty of the commission to keep itself informed regarding the operations of such voluntary plans and it shall include pertinent statistics regarding such plans in its biennial reports.

SEC. 4. A new subsection is added to each of sections 20.57, 71.03, and 71.04 of the statutes to read: (20.57) (5) On January 1, 1932, $25,000 to assist employers in the establishment of voluntary plans for unemployment compensation in conformity with the standards prescribed by law and for carrying out the purposes of chapter 108. This appropriation shall remain available until June 30, 1933.

(71.03) (10) Amounts contributed to an unemployment fund, compulsory or voluntary, or an unemployment reserve established in conformity with law, but not the amounts paid out of said fund or reserve.

(71.04) (10) Amounts contributed to an unemployment fund, compulsory or voluntary, or an unemployment reserve established in conformity with law, but not the amounts paid out of said fund or reserve.

SEC. 5. Subsection (9a) of section 101.10 of the statutes is amended to read: (101.10) (9a) * * * Any county, city, town, or village may enter into an agreement with the Wisconsin industrial commission for such period of time as may be deemed desirable for the purpose of establishing and maintaining local free employment offices, and it shall be lawful for any county, city, town, or village to appropriate and expend the necessary money and to permit the use of public property for the joint establishment and maintenance of such offices as may be agreed upon, or in counties containing 250,000 inhabitants or more in any city, town, or village therein to purchase a site and construct necessary buildings. * * *: Provided, * * * That, in any county, city, village, or town therein, wherein there is a citizens' committee on unemployment, such committee shall have the power to rent, lease, purchase, or construct necessary buildings for the joint establishment and maintenance of such free employment office, subject to the approval of such plans by the industrial commission. The industrial commission may establish such free employment offices as it may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of chapter 108. All expenses of such offices, or all expenses not defrayed by the county, city, town, or village in which an office is located, shall be charged to the appropriation to the industrial commission provided in section 20.573.

SEC. 6. Sections 2 and 5 of this act shall take effect as provided in section 3 and all other provisions upon passage and publication.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not believe there has been any debate in the Senate during my tenure of 10 years in this body which has shown more moderation and more poise in the presentation of the case, with greater preparation in the way of collecting data, than in the presentation of the particular measure now before us. I think the discussion has been of a very high order. I could take very little exception to anything that has been said; less on this occasion than upon the occasion of the discussion of any subject I have heard for a good while.

During the last session the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reported a resolution, which had been submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, looking to a survey and the collection of data by that committee in building up the case, if there be a case, for extending Federal relief in the emergency of unemployment. I think that the chairman of the committee is to be commended for the manner in which he presented those data to the Senate in the effort to establish a principle in which, I take it, he unreservedly believes. His presentation of the case was strongly supported by the coauthor of the pending measure in an able discussion of a second phase of the problem. The manner in which the substitute has been presented is free of the emotions that usually accompany such arguments rather to the disadvantage of the facts; and I am of the opinion that the subject has been presented in a very strong light.

I do not believe in the proposition that the Federal Government should be called upon to extend relief, at least until it has become quite obvious that there is no other way to meet the situation; and from listening to the arguments of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] and others I do not think there is much difference between their view and my own on the real issue which is involved. The difference in our decision would lie in the consideration whether we have reached a point where local relief has broken down and where starvation is inevitable unless the Federal Government shall render assistance. I do not think that stage has as yet been reached.

I want frankly to state here, so that there shall be no misunderstanding of my view, that, with the country supplied with abundant food, I should not be one who would deny it in order to prevent starvation simply because I do not believe in the Federal Government taking that step. If I thought there was not anything else to be done, there would be with me no choice in the matter. So it seems that the difference is one of degree rather than of principle, so far as the substitute is concerned.

The difference, however, as to the original proposition is not one of degree, but it is one of principle. I want to speak briefly to that particular phase of the discussion. I am opposed to the Federal Government entering upon such a relief program, because when we shall embark upon it there will be no end to it, for I think it can not be denied by anyone that the demands will be steadily progressive. It is not the length of the step when first taken that is significant, it is the direction in which the step is taken. When it is first taken it may be a short step, and may be hesitantly taken, but the second step will be easy; the third one will be still easier; and before long the practice thus inaugurated becomes a permanent policy of the Government, and there can be no retreat from it. This is as inevitable as that the sun will come up to-morrow morning. For that reason, before we shall take this proposed step we ought to make sure that there is not anything else left for us to do.

I recall, as does every other Member of the Senate, whether he was in the Senate or out of the Senate at the time, the hesitancy expressed in both bodies of Congress when it was suggested that the Federal Government should come to the relief of a city that suffered from the ravages of a great fire. I refer to the city of Salem, Mass. There was general disinclination to respond to requests for relief to that city, but the suffering was so obvious that the case appealed to a large proportion of the citizens of Massachusetts; they made their representations here; and, while some of the Massachusetts people resisted the request, it appealed to the sympathies of both Houses, and the relief was granted by the Federal Government.

There is no hesitation now in similar cases. When such relief was first granted it was reluctantly and tardily done; but when San Francisco was visited by an earthquake and a great fire and the call for relief came to the Congress, the proposition was debated for only a very short time. Not only was the first call speedily responded to—and at that time we thought the response was adequate—but when the relief rendered in response to the first call was found to be inadequate, and a second call for relief came, a million and a half dollars more were voted in a very short time to amplify the relief which had been rendered in the first instance. There was very little opposition to it. The people seemed to think that such action having been taken before, it should be taken again. So the next step will be still more easily taken.

The effect of such a step by Congress in establishing a precedent to guide the Senate and the House in the future was well illustrated last year in this body when the then Senator from Alabama was speaking on the drought situation, making a strong plea for assistance to sufferers from the drought in the southeastern part of the country, with special reference to his own State.

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], who, I regret to say, is detained from the Senate floor because of illness, rose to question the Senator from Alabama. He wanted to know whether the native State of the Senator from Alabama was not willing to come to the relief of the people in the drought-stricken areas without calling upon the Federal Government. All of us will recall how the Senator from Alabama reminded the Senator from California that he did not raise that question when San Francisco was calling for aid. That rejoinder of the Senator from Alabama evidently had a very strong effect on the Senator from California, who afterwards not only spoke for the measure which he had been criticizing but voted for it. That is a very concrete illustration of the effect of taking the first step in a new direction. Once taken, even though reluctantly, it becomes easy later on to proceed further along the same line.

The Senator from Wisconsin, in the discussion last year on measures proposing relief for sufferers in drought-stricken areas, included in his speech, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of December 15, 1930, page 708, a very important list of Federal contributions made by our Government from time to time. It embraces numerous instances of contributions the Federal Government has made from time to time. Most of them grew out of events occasioned by what may be called acts of God, such as floods, fires, earthquakes, and so on—disasters for which the populations affected, of course, could not be held responsible. The list is most informative in corroboration of what I am saying—that when once such a step is taken it is not difficult to take it the second time, and after a while it will be taken without any reluctance whatever and, in fact, it will be regarded as a Federal duty.

Now, in the measure pending we are proposing to take a step that is a new one, one that we never have as yet taken, in that we are called upon to regard the Federal Government as being responsible for taking care of the unemployed. That is a new step, and it is one that it is going to be difficult to realize its results. If we take it, it will be under pressure, first, of localities and, second, on account of the great sympathy of Members of this body and the other body who do not want to be meticulous over a theory, provided the facts justify abandoning the theory. That is the stage in which we are to-day.

I mentioned a moment ago that if there is no other way to meet the situation we will have to meet it in some such way as has been proposed, and there are Senators all around me who will say the same thing; but my concern is that when we take that step then the floodgates are open, and we will come to a place—now mark what I say—where the Federal Government will be regarded as responsible not only for suffering caused by unemployment but will be called upon as in duty bound to relieve it by feeding the people rather than finding something for them to do and making them self-supporting. That is the danger of the proposal now before us.

When we consider that the burden thus to be imposed upon the Federal Government is to be met by taxation the danger will appear to be cumulative, because the unemployed will regard it then as a right on their part to demand of the Government either work or food when they have not any work. If we have come to that place where we regard it as proper for the unemployed, for whatever reason may be assigned, to put in a claim of right that the Federal Government should relieve them, then we have started the building of an organization that will be much more powerful than any group that to-day is operating in our land, and there is not anybody here who is not awake to the power of the pressure of groups that become political in their activities.

I can recall, and the Vice President will especially recall, as will many other Members of this body, the time when the Civil War pensioner would resent the payment of a pension unless he was in a needy and hopeless situation. I have close friends who once resented the idea that they should be given a pension when they were in good position and able to provide their own livelihood. So for years a great body of Civil War veterans not only refused but resented the idea that pensions should be given to them. The time came when the distinguished General Sherwood, a brilliant Union officer of the Civil War, serving in the other body of Congress, introduced a service pension bill. It was backed by the prestige of a distinguished general, and he made a strong plea that it did not make any difference how long a soldier's service was or whether or not he was injured or whether or not he was needy or whether or not he had the wherewithal to live he ought to be paid a service pension.

When that law was considered, at first there was considerable opposition, not only in Congress but out of Congress, and among soldiers included in the bill. Ultimately, however, the bill became law—the service pension law—and then persons who before had refused to be beneficiaries said, "If you are going to do this for everybody, we, of course, want you to do it for us"; and Senators know the general practice that is now in vogue.

Not only is that true there, but it will be true in the future. It is that sort of thing to which I desire to call the attention of Senators—that we are entering upon a policy here the end of which we will never see; and the amount that will be demanded will always be uncertain, because conditions in different sections will be different, and the claims will not be the same. The amount that will be demanded from one group will not be demanded from another. There will be no measure of relief by which we can safely enter upon it; and the sum of the burden of taxation that must supply a permanent fund for looking after the unemployed, from whatever reason the unemployment exists, will be simply staggering.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FESS. I yield for a question. I do not want to be interrupted in the consecutive statement I should like to make; but if the Senator desires to ask me something on what I am now speaking about, of course, I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. My question was, Is not this an emergency which is quite unlikely to happen very frequently in the history of our country?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York raises a question that I have in mind. All of these remedial efforts, as a rule, are emergent; but the Senator knows that although a matter may be presented at one time as an emergency, when the emergency again arises the same thing will be presented, and in many cases it will be presented if the emergency does not arise but when there is merely a semblance of the emergency; and what was taken as an emergency call and responded to as a matter of emergency relief will become a permanent practice, as the Senator knows has been the case in the past.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Do I understand that the Senator is favorable to the relief of these conditions by local taxation in the cities and States?

Mr. FESS. That is better than relieving them by local taxation. It should be done by voluntary methods rather than by local taxation.

Mr. BROOKHART. But as long as voluntary methods are not sufficient the Senator is in favor of local taxation?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. I do.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to ask the Senator if I understood him correctly as thinking that all of this ought to be done by private contributions to charity?

Mr. FESS. Personally, I favor that method as far as it can be done. If the locality is not served by private contributions, however, I see no objection to the municipality, for example, assessing its own people in the form of local taxation.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator see any reason why one group of citizens who are charitably inclined should assume the responsibility of relieving unemployment on behalf of the "tight wads" who sew up their pocketbooks and contribute nothing to the relief of unemployment?

Mr. FESS. I know that that is the query that comes from a great number of men and women who are sincerely thinking on this problem—whether unless relief is provided by taxation there will not be "tight wads" who will not respond. I think that is so. I regret that it is true; but, that being the case, I do not believe that is a justification yet for the Federal Government taking this step.

Another thing, there are no people in the world who have set the example for local relief like the people of the United States. It is provided not only in our counties but in every county of the Nation, in many of the townships, in most of the cities, and in all of the States. The charitable movements for the care of the welfare of the people are numerous, and they are stupendously important and great. There is not a first-class city in the country that does not have its various city hospitals, supported in part by voluntary contributions and in part by vote of the people of the city in the form of local taxation. There is not a State in the Union that does not have a splendid charitable organization for taking care, for example, of the unfortunate, the incurables, the imbeciles, those who lose their minds. The deaf and the dumb and the blind are taken care of in our State by a system of State education and industrial schools.

There is no movement in the country that is more prominent than local relief as seen in States, counties, and municipalities. I think every county has its home for the poor. Every county in Ohio has. I believe every county in the Nation has; and almost every county in the State has its children's home as a county institution. So I do not think one is justified in the assumption that voluntary contributions are to be ignored simply because some "tight wads" refuse to open up their pockets.

Mr. FRAZIER and Mr. CUTTING addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FESS. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I simply desire to correct the statement of the Senator in regard to county poorhouses. In the State of North Dakota, so far as I know, there are only 2 counties out of 53 in the State that have county poorhouses; but if these conditions keep on, they probably will all have to have them.

Mr. FESS. Is that due to the fact that you do not have among you the poor?

Mr. FRAZIER. Practically so; yes. It has been so in the past, at least.

Mr. FESS. I assumed that. I should not have made the statement as broad as I did—that these institutions exist in every county.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. CUTTING addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator that in a very brief study I made of the question he is now discussing I found that it had become the practice in a great many localities where they had had county poor farms and poorhouses to dispose of them and take care of their poor in other ways.

Mr. FESS. That is new to me.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the practice of having poor farms—which, I think, as the Senator said, was quite general—is going the other way at the present time.

Mr. FESS. It is universal in Ohio to have these county homes for the poor. I had not had my attention called to the situation of which the Senator speaks. I knew nothing about that. That has not taken place in Ohio, where I am informed.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CUTTING. I realize that we are intruding on the Senator's argument, and I do not want to press my question at the present time.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I merely want to say that the evidence before the Manufactures Committee was overwhelming that the present system of voluntary and local relief had broken down. I hope at some stage in the Senator's argument he will give some constructive alternative which he thinks Congress ought to adopt; or is it the Senator's idea that we shall simply sit with our hands folded and let the unemployed starve to death?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Mexico is entirely justified in the interruption he has made—that if local relief has broken down, it then becomes a subject for constructive thinking as to what can be done to supplement the local relief.

I think the Senator must realize that if we select our witnesses we can very easily establish the allegation that local relief has entirely broken down. There probably is not a county or a municipality in the country where we could not find people who think that the Federal Government has a duty in this realm, and should come to the rescue; and they would make themselves believe that the local communities have gone as far as they could go, and therefore that this is a function that the General Government must undertake.

I read all of the statements put into the RECORD by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. A great many of them are from social-service people. These people are the best people we have in any locality. They are people actuated by the finest motives in the world. There is not a bit of doubt that they feel that the Government should do this, and localities should not. There is not the slightest doubt that they would like to have respectability given to their efforts by recognition in the form of Federal appropriations. There is no doubt about it.

The difficulty is, as I sat and listened on another occasion to the testimony dealing with a similar question, and interjected a query that seemed to be somewhat adverse to what the proponents desired, all around me people were whispering audibly, "Well, what is the matter with FESS?" In other words, I was not responding to the emotional demands for Federal relief in a situation in which I did not think the Federal Government was obligated; and at once, amongst the best people in the world, I found ridicule because I did not respond to the call of these social-service people.

Take the cases that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] inserted in the RECORD. I have had them all analyzed, and some of them I analyzed myself. I especially analyzed the letters from Ohio. I find that in certain cities in Ohio the mayors say, "We need your help. We have broken down. We have gotten to our limit, and we would gladly receive the aid of the Government"; and some of them are quite enthusiastic about receiving it.

For example, there is the city of Alliance, a great industrial city near Canton, Ohio, a city of 25,000 people, where there is a large industrial population. Naturally I would expect that city to ask for Federal relief. But the answer to that question is "no."

When we read the question sent out by the Senator it is very unexpected to find "no" as an answer. Let me read the question:

Do you favor a Federal appropriation to assist the local governments in meeting their emergency relief burdens?

If it stopped there it could easily be answered "yes" or "no," because that admits of an answer "yes" or "no." But that is not the whole question. Here is the other part of it:

And do you feel that such an appropriation would be of aid in providing more adequate relief for the needy or in lessening the burden on local taxpayers?

Who could answer that, "No"?

Of course, a Federal appropriation going to any city would relieve the burden on the local people in proportion to the amount given. So that when we read that query and then read the answers to it, we must decide that they reflect the feeling of the people of the cities to which the inquiry was sent.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if the Senator were persuaded that the local communities were unable, with both private and public contributions, to cope with the present emergency, would he then favor the intervention of the Federal Government for an appropriation?

Mr. FESS. That is the only basis on which I would favor it. Whether the Senator was in the Chamber or not I did not notice, but I stated that if there were starvation and no method of relief outside of assistance from the Federal Government, I would vote for relief by the Federal Government.

Here is a letter from Ashland. Ashland is a little town about 40 miles south of Cleveland, in a rich agricultural section, and with a high-grade population. To the question I have read Ashland answered "Yes." I do not know whether it is fair to say that the second part of that question compels the "yes" or whether the mayor of that city might have answered categorically "yes" on Federal relief, because I can see that a great number of people, without thinking of the extent to which it would go or where it would lead, thinking only of relief, would answer "yes." But I want Senators to note the two parts to that question and the difficulty of any mayor answering "no."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to suggest to the Senator that there was no implication in the questionnaire that it was necessary for them to answer any question yes or no. There were many questions which could not be answered yes or no. The object was to elicit the opinions of these mayors.

Mr. FESS. I hope the Senator will accept my word that I am not criticizing his method at all. I am calling attention simply to the answers, and trying to indicate that the answers might or might not mean yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In many instances the Senator will find that the mayors responded with a long paragraph in answer to that question, as in answer to the other six questions.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator did a real service when he undertook to get a cross section of opinion of the country, and I do not want him to think that I am indulging in criticism. I am trying to analyze the situation, just as he did in his presentation.

The city of Barberton is a suburb of Akron. Akron has had a more phenomenal growth than any other city in the country, unless it would be Flint, Mich.; Huntington, W. Va.; or some town of that sort. I recall distinctly when Akron was a city of 27,000 inhabitants. It is a city now of nearly 300,000 inhabitants, its growth being due almost entirely to the rubber industry. Barberton is not a part of Akron municipally, but virtually is a part of that city.

I would have supposed that the reply of the mayor of Barberton would have been in the affirmative to the question I have read. Here is an example of a very long answer, an answer occupying nearly a column of the RECORD. It states:

We do not approve of the Federal Government extending any emergency relief to any political subdivision, except in the case of great disaster over which the community has no control.

And so on. In my judgment, that expresses the general feeling of the country at large. I think that feeling is entertained throughout the South, throughout the East, and the West, unless it would be in some of the great centers of population.

When we come to the centers of population, I want to call attention especially to the city of Cleveland, the home of my distinguished colleague [Mr. BULKLEY], who made a very able presentation of his views over the radio the other night, to which I listened, and which I read again last night, and who also presented his position in an admirable manner on the floor of the Senate yesterday.

Cleveland's answer to the question to which I have referred ought to put alarm into the heart of every person who does not want to take an unwise position. This is the answer:

Cleveland's feeling and slogan has always been, "Cleveland will take care of her own." We are certain that this attitude will continue and feel that the ability to do so will continue to exist.

Listen, I want every Member of the Senate to note this significant statement:

However, if any Federal appropriation to assist any local government should be made, Cleveland would, of course, expect to receive its proportionate share.

There is the danger! That is the thing that always exists. "We do not approve of it; but if you are going to do it, we want our share," and in a short time "our share" will be the law of the land. Just as the pensioner says, "I do not believe in this policy; but if you are going into business of distributing bonuses, we want ours." And then, if sufficient pressure can be exerted to start it, they get theirs, and then it ceases to be temporary; it becomes immediately permanent. The largest claim on the tax-burdened peoples of the United States will ultimately come from this fund if we ever enter upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming, for the purpose of my question, that relief is necessary; assuming also that the distress is general all over the country; and then assuming that we are going to take care of the starving and suffering people—I think those are three fair assumptions——

Mr. FESS. They are.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming those things, after all, is not the fairest way of all to bring the relief by taxation which comes from revenues collected from all the people?

Mr. FESS. I do not agree with that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not agree?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not believe that is sound.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, the Senator certainly means, it seems to me, that a part of the people who, as the Senator from Michigan said, are charitably inclined and are liberal must bear all the burden.

Mr. FESS. Not necessarily. There could be local taxation.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, the Senator would mean, if that is his position, that every place would have to assess itself locally. In other words, the Senator's proposition would mean the establishment of poorhouses everywhere, in every locality?

Mr. FESS. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. And would not the burden be just the same, no matter what method was used, whether the money comes from one source or another, if everybody pays equally?

Mr. FESS. It would not mean more poorhouses. It would mean more effective community organizations to take care of the needy in a locality. I recognize that the Senator from Michigan puts his finger upon one of the objectionable features when he refers to leaving it simply voluntary. I think he is right, that there will be some people who, without the pressure of law, would simply do nothing and would not participate in the general relief. But they could be reached by local taxation, if that seemed necessary, and that is very much better than Federal taxation and the establishment of a permanent bureau to handle this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me ask another thing.

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Many States have gone as far as they can without violating their constitutions, and making higher assessments than they have made.

Mr. FESS. Would not the Senator agree that if there is any local inhibition in the law of a State which forbids it taking care of its own people, the law should be changed, rather than that they should come to the Federal Government for help?

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; in the meantime, the starving people are dying. That is the real objection to that.

Mr. FESS. That is an assumption.

Mr. NORRIS. People can not live a year without eating, and in some cases it would take two or three years to change the law.

Mr. FESS. There is no use for us to quibble over a matter of this sort. There is no doubt that there is not a city in the country which can not take care of its unemployed. Consider the wealth of New York City, for example, the one city about which there is so much talk regarding unemployment. To say that the wealth of that city is not sufficient to take care of their own is an indictment of the city, and there is no basis for it.

Mr. NORRIS. How are they to get at that wealth?

Mr. FESS. It is true that it will require more than the people want to give, but they can not and should not shunt the responsibility that belongs to them on the Federal Government. That is the position I take.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator whether he does not believe that the owners of real estate generally have stood all the taxes they can bear?

Mr. FESS. If that be true, then we had better reduce taxation by cutting the cost of the city governments.

Mr. COUZENS. That may be true, but I am speaking about the emergency situation, when millions of dollars of taxes have been uncollected, because the property owners can not pay the taxes. Millions of dollars are unpaid because people are out of work and can not even pay the installments on their homes. They can not pay taxes, and the municipalities can not collect any more real-estate taxes. And is it not true that the Federal Government has preempted the field of income taxes and profit taxes, so that these people of great wealth can not be reached?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, it is true, of course, that the tax rates in the municipalities are so high that it is hardly profitable to own real estate in the cities any more. That is true. But it does not mean that the city or the property owners are so poor that they can not subject themselves to additional taxation to care for their own people.

Mr. COUZENS. They can not pay their taxes. Evidence from every community indicates the large amount of back taxes unpaid.

Mr. FESS. Let me make a comment upon the Senator's observation. His argument will be heard in this Chamber often, and unless some caution is exercised such a principle will become the law within 10 years. The Federal Government is going to be called upon to assist in paying share for share the State taxation in the country. Already bills have been introduced providing that the Federal Government shall share in the expense of the education of the people of the States. Bills have been introduced providing that the Federal Government shall share in the building of roads in the States, and I am committed to that idea as long as it is primarily for the Federal Government. Bills have already been introduced providing that the Federal Government shall appropriate to the States in proportion to their rural population for the educational needs of the State. Such a bill as that has been introduced providing that the expenses of rural education in the States should be participated in by a pro rata payment from Federal funds.

The next step will be on the basis that the States are suffering from a rate of taxation that they can not endure, and the Federal Government will be called upon to assist each State in the payment of its taxes. Such a measure as that no doubt will be introduced in this body and become a law before 10 years more shall have passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to draw the Senator's attention to the testimony of Mr. Raymond Clapp, director of the Welfare Federation of Cleveland, in connection with the Senator's statement that it is possible for the cities, the city of Cleveland in particular, with the wealth which resides in the city, to raise sufficient funds to meet the unemployment relief burden. I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that on two different occasions in his testimony Mr. Clapp expressed the definite opinion that it would be impossible, in view of the extraordinary generosity which has already been shown on the part of private contributors in Cleveland, to secure any large additional sums to make up the deficit which he finds in the relief funds in that city.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend from Wisconsin that I had stated that there is no doubt that we could find testimony to that effect in every city of the United States. Whether it is because they prefer to have the assistance of the Federal Government rather than to be compelled to look after the local contributions, in every city of the Nation there will be people calling for Federal appropriations on the basis that local needs could not be cared for by local contributions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In justice to Mr. Clapp, I would like to point out that he has been for many years associated with the community chest and community fund of Cleveland, and has, of course, relied almost entirely, until this emergency came on, upon private contributions for funds, and therefore is committed to the proposal that the charities in ordinary times shall be maintained by private contributions.

Mr. FESS. That qualifies him as a better witness than the average man.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator is speaking of the ease with which such testimony can be obtained. I wonder if he recalls the very powerful case that was made to us here only a few weeks ago in behalf of the city of New York, where we were told that if we did not come to the aid of the city of New York within a week, she would be absolutely bankrupt, because she could not raise the money to meet her impending maturities.

Mr. FESS. I recall it very vividly.

Mr. REED. And we refused to do it, although a tremendously appealing case was made to us, and within the same week New Yorkers put their house in order and took care of their own needs at home.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I want to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that Mr. Clapp does not appear primarily as an advocate of Federal aid. I understand that he is in favor of local responsibility. What he was testifying to before the committee was simply a statement of facts with respect to the difficulty of raising money in the city of Cleveland. I want to call attention clearly to the fact that since that testimony was given, it has been decided not to have another community-fund drive this spring in Cleveland, it being regarded as not a practicable thing to do. The needs of the city of Cleveland are even greater than was testified to by Mr. Clapp.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, my colleague knows very well that there will be no further community drives in any city if there is any promise of the Federal Government doing the thing the cities ought to do. If the Federal Government causes it to be clearly understood that it is not going into that field, there will be no question about the money to take care of the needs of the people of Cleveland, because that city would not tolerate a failure to meet its responsibility in such a case.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Upon the precise point which the Senator has just submitted, may I call his attention to the following sentence in a letter from the Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Joseph, Mich., written this week:

> As we see the situation at the moment, it is merely giving local and State welfare organizations an excuse to sit back on the job and let the Federal Government care for the welfare needs.

That is precisely the point the Senator is making.

Mr. FESS. It is perfectly obvious that if there goes out from this Chamber a suggestion that the Federal Government is going into the cities to do what the cities ought to do for themselves, there will not be another dollar collected from the cities. They do not want to undertake the carrying of the burden when it is unnecessary.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. FESS. I gladly yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I dislike to interrupt again, but I think I may fairly say in behalf of the city of Cleveland that it is not soliciting Federal aid and that the decision to have no community drive is in no sense influenced by the expectation that this bill is going to pass, because nobody ever expected that it would pass. The situation in Cleveland is a very difficult one, and it has not yet been solved. I am, of course, not saying that it will not be solved, but it has not yet been solved, and its solution is not being held back by any expectation of Federal relief.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not want to seem to be antagonistic to what my colleague said. The city of Cleveland will not suffer so long as it has in it such men as the Senator on this floor who lives there. I know what I am talking about. It is a burden, but they will take care of the burden rather than let the people suffer.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FESS. I wish the Senator would let me proceed.

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator refuse to yield?

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; I do not refuse to yield. I should like to proceed, but I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator enumerated a number of instances where the Federal Government had been called upon to aid. Inadvertently he must have overlooked a recent instance to which both he and I are committed, namely, that the Federal Government was asked to help the railroads, the banks, and other financial institutions, to aid in their rehabilitation because of their distressed condition.

Mr. FESS. May I say that that reference calls to mind the matter referred to in the outset of my remarks, the only thing that has been said in the discussion which is not up to the level of the general debate. The Senator has referred to a phase of the discussion which ought never to have entered this debate, namely, that under the provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill we are aiding the railroads and aiding the banks as if it were donations as required by the measure now before us. That is a wholly different proposition in that it is a loan. It is not a gift. It does not mean, when once it is started, that it will be continued unless the payments of interest and principal will justify the aid as a business proposition. That is the only feature of the debate that is below the level upon which it ought to have been kept. To assert that we give to the railroads by that bill aid, but deny it to the poor starving people in this bill is to say something that never ought to have been said in debate of this kind.

Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. WAGNER, and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FESS. I must decline to yield to anyone just now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the mayor of Wauseon wrote this letter:

> NOVEMBER 28, 1931.
> Hon. ROBERT LA FOLLETTE.
> DEAR SIR: Received your questionnaire; take great pleasure in answering same. If there were any way possible to furnish work for the men in our locality instead of just giving them eats and clothing, they would be earning their way instead of calling it charity. If you could tell me of any way I could do this, sure would be fine.
>
> Our town is overbonded at this time. I have plenty of work to do if we could float bonds.
>
> Mr. LA FOLLETTE, I sure thank you for thinking of our small towns in a time like this. Anything you can do will be appreciated by us.
>
> Sincerely yours,
> GEORGE GEER, Mayor.

I have here the local paper published in Wauseon containing an article headed "$375,000,000 Congress proposes to dole out in name of charity." Then it speaks of the nationwide drive for relief, and then says:

> Thirty-nine Ohio mayors responded to Senator LA FOLLETTE'S questionnaire, and of the 39, 19 favored substantial Federal relief and 19 expressed opposition, while 1 was noncommittal.

That is not quite true. There were more in opposition than there were in favor of Federal relief. Then the article continues:

> Not only is there a great howl for these millions of dollars from the Federal Government for relief but we are being beseiged to call a special session of the legislature that laws may be enacted to raise funds for relief, which means more taxes.

Then the article proceeds:

> During the days of wild prosperity we lost our sense of responsibility to the community. At every emergency that arose the cry went up "let the Government do it," whether it was State or Federal, and the Government has been doing it until taxes have become so heavy that they have reached the breaking point. One thing is certain. If the Government spends money, the taxpayers will have to furnish it. Those in need should not be permitted to suffer for the want of the common necessities of life. To supply these is the business of the local community, and the sooner we buckle down to the job and do it the better off will we all be. To care for the poor is the responsibility of the local community, and not the Federal Government, unless a calamity overwhelms us.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a few moments ago the Senator from Ohio made a distinction that is entirely clear to my own mind between the pending bill and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law. I have received a number of communications characterizing the appropriation under the latter act as a dole. Whatever may be the true and applicable definition of that term, there is, of course, no dole intended in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. Losses may occur; they may not occur.

The substitute that has been offered for the pending bill incorporates the same principle as that embraced in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. It provides, in the event that there is a threatened immediate breakdown in local relief, and the governor of a State so certifies, that loans may be made to the State for the administration of emergency relief through State agencies.

I inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether, in his opinion, such a provision will not constitute a restraint on future appeals to the Federal Government which may or may not rest on an actual basis of immediate and emergency need? If a State, through its chief executive or its financial board, as the substitute provides, certifies to the Treasury that it can not provide and does not possess the funds or resources essential to meet the requirements of its citizens for immediate and emergency relief, what objection does the Senator find to permitting the Federal Government to extend to such a State the same measure of consideration and relief that is provided to financial institutions through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

I think the Senator's argument that the establishing of a precedent of the nature contemplated by this measure is of overshadowing importance, but, in view of the fact that the substitute contemplates that loans shall be made to the States, and made only when the executive authority of the State certifies that there is immediate and unquestionable necessity for it, and when it is provided that, in case a State, for any reason, fails to make provision for repayment within three years from the passage of the act, the advances to the State for emergency relief shall be deducted from allotments to the State under the Federal highway act, I think that the principle for which the Senator is contending has been fairly met.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think I ought to say that since the Senator has taken the floor there has come to me from the President of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce a message setting forth, in brief, the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio. I presume the Senator from Ohio has also received that message. It is signed by Frank G. McMillan, president of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce, and asserts that the State of Ohio is amply able to take care of the requirements of those who are in distressed circumstances, and that the enactment of any measure of the character now contemplated will result in partial paralysis, at least, of the efforts of those who are trying to work out the problem through local assistance.

Mr. FESS. I am not sure that I have received such a telegram as the Senator from Arkansas, but I rather think I have.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I pass the telegram to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. Let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that very frankly, without any hesitation, I say that if anything is to be done along the lines that have been suggested by the two proposals, far and away it is preferable to take the substitute, because it does deal with the subject locally. The Federal Government would be rendering the assistance through the medium of loans, and the responsibility of administration would be on the States and not on the Federal Government. That is a virtue of the substitute. If we are to do anything or render any assistance through the Federal Government, it should be by loans, and they should not go to individual cities nor to individuals but should be administered by the State authorities. That is my view if it is necessary for us to render this character of relief.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it not also true that unless there shall be urgent necessity for it, no State will apply for assistance under the condition that it will repay the amount advanced?

Mr. FESS. I think that element is involved, in that the money has to be paid back. Therefore unnecessary borrowing, so far as the State under its constitution may borrow, would not be undertaken, because the money must be returned at some time. The only point is whether the governor of a State might not, in his extreme sympathy for those in distress, go beyond what the Senator from Arkansas and I would think it essential for the Government to do. I do not want to be misunderstood. I have spoken to Senators around me and I believe they agree with me that if Federal aid has to be extended to local communities in order to take care of the situation and relieve those who are facing starvation, the substitute offers a legitimate method of accomplishing that end; but I am not convinced we have reached the point where that is imperative.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, one further statement and then I will not interrupt the Senator again at this time. He has been good enough to yield to me very generously.

I wish to point out to the Senator this fact—and it is a fact, in my humble judgment—that no governor of any State would be prompted to seek Federal assistance when the circumstances, in his opinion, did not exist that made such action urgent and necessary. No governor would be too quick to apply for funds under this bill, because that would imply his recognition of the inability of the State and of its local authorities and agencies to meet obligations which commonly are accepted as resting upon them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I want to discuss briefly the substitute, but not at this moment. I want first to finish with the letters which were sent to the Senator from Wisconsin, and I will finish that portion of my argument now by asking to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, an analysis of all the letters which were sent to the Senator from Wisconsin. The analysis opens with the last question propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin as to whether the recipient favored the extension of Federal aid. Then, State by State, the replies are listed—those in favor, those opposed, and those that did not take a position or whose position was not certain. Of the entire number 320 mayors of cities or spokesmen for such mayors favored the granting of Federal aid, 369 opposed it, and 86 were noncommittal.

I desire that information inserted in the RECORD as being a fairly safe representation of public opinion. It must be understood that the replies were all from cities where the problem is immediately facing them; they do not come from populations in the rural districts at all; and when we realize that in the cities, large and small, there is a considerable majority opposed to Federal relief being extended, even with the question being asked whether such relief would relieve the local communities, it is very significant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). Without objection, the analysis presented by the Senator from Ohio will be printed in the RECORD.

The analysis referred to is as follows:

Question: Do you favor a Federal appropriation to assist the local governments in meeting their emergency relief burdens, and do you feel that such an appropriation would be of aid in providing more adequate relief for the needy or in lessening the burden on local taxpayers?

Mr. FESS. Now, Mr. President, in reference to the substitute, let me say that I do not think we have reached the point where the remedy proposed is imperative. If it is imperative, if Federal funds should be resorted to, then, in my judgment, they should be distributed through the States and never as gifts, because if Federal funds shall be supplied as a gift, there will be less concern as to how they are administered. So in my opinion if Federal funds are to be provided, they ought to be provided in the form of loans, and they should carry with them the obligation to repay. I think they should be provided at a low rate of interest; I would favor that; but it ought to be specifically understood that the money is advanced as a loan and must be returned. The only difficulty in connection with the substitute, so far as the loan feature is concerned, is that some States are inhibited by their constitutions from borrowing money.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that suggestion of the Senator is pertinent, and I think the Senator is correct. It was for that reason that I offered an amendment to the substitute, which was accepted by the proponents of it.

Mr. FESS. I favor the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, and I heard it read, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. And the amendment places it absolutely within the power of the Federal Government to retain money to the amount of the loan from subsequent appropriations for highway purposes.

Mr. FESS. I think that is a safeguard to the substitute and certainly ought to be adopted. My point, I will say to my friend from Nevada, is that I have not thought we have reached the stage as yet where we ought to take this step.

There is a weakness in the loan feature that I do not think could be corrected, which is due to the limitations on a State loaning its credit; and I understand, for that reason, that it was written as it is. I am not criticizing it, only it does make it possible for a State not to pay back except as the Federal Government may subsequently withhold funds because of the debt that the State may owe it.

There is another feature of the matter that is subject to some criticism, and yet I do not know that that criticism is controlling. It is that these appropriations are not matched in our Federal-aid plan.

Heretofore, whenever we have made provision for Federal aid, we have always required the States to do so and so; but in this case we are not requiring it. There is one danger there. When we appropriate Federal money, the authority of the Federal Government always follows it in its application. In this case it could not do so, and there would be objection to having it done. In other words, it is not the idea of the Federal Government to go into any particular State and determine its school system, or determine its taxing system, or determine its road system. That is left to the State government, and it ought to be. We wrote all these Federal-aid bills on that basis; but, at the same time, the Federal Government can state the conditions under which the appropriation is made. That is a weakening element in the substitute that I think everybody will observe.

As to the feature of making appropriations for public construction, I am for that. I believe it is sound as a relief measure, but it is open to dangers. Federal construction ought to be limited to that which has a reproductive element. Our aim ought to be not simply to put somebody to work to do a thing that we may not want or may not need, but to limit it to things that have a reproductive element. Otherwise the plan is not sound. I believe that feature ought to be considered very carefully before we expand too much along the lines of that program.

So, stating my view on the subject, if there is to be any Federal aid on the subject we are talking about, the proposal in the substitute is greatly preferable to the other. To me the other is impossible.

With reference to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] speaking of the dole, there are any number of people who resent any reference to this legislation as a dole. There is some basis for that if we want to be technical about what a dole means. If we say that only a certain type of Federal aid is a dole, then, of course, any other Federal aid that is not of that type, but that might have the same effect, would not be a dole. To say that it is not a dole, however, is no argument, because it amounts to the same thing. It has the same effect.

For example, I hold in my hand one of the best treatises that has ever been written on the subject, by a great English author, published in London. It is by John Barton Seymour. At the end of the book he gives seven pages of bibliography of authorities consulted in writing this book. He resents the idea that the present British system is a dole. He declares it is a misnomer. He says:

> As a matter of fact, no form of the unemployment benefit can justly be called a "dole." This word is defined in the dictionary as meaning "alms or gratuity." The application of such a term to unemployment benefit overlooks the fact that the scheme provides for contributory insurance and that four-fifths of the unemployment fund is supplied by employers and workpeople.

And he denounces the stigma that is applied to the present British system of dole. Everybody knows that it is not a mere technical expression that we are talking about, however; it is the thing itself that we call the dole.

First, the British system was an unemployment-insurance system; and the provision was that two-fifths of the fund should be contributed by the employer, two-fifths by the employee, and one-fifth by the Government. Unfortunately, the law was so written that after so many contributions on the part of an employee he became a beneficiary, and the beneficiaries started to withdraw their funds before a substantial fund was created. Then came the sweep of unemployment, and that fund was immediately exhausted; and the unemployment-insurance system broke down, just as a fire-insurance company breaks down when there is a great fire and all the property in the town insured by that company is destroyed. It breaks the company, just as the unemployment in Great Britain broke down the insurance plan in Great Britain. Note that the obligation of the Government to make a one-fifth contribution while the employer made a two-fifths contribution and the employee made a two-fifths contribution indicated the function of the Government, showing an obligation to the unemployed; and when the fund was exhausted they demanded that the reservoir of the Government's treasury must be resorted to to replenish the fund, and it was done. It always will be done; and the result is to-day that two and a half million people in Great Britain are receiving a dole from the Government treasury, and they can not get rid of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. Just a moment.

When Ramsay MacDonald, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, announced the necessity of balancing the budget, and stated that as a measure in balancing the budget he recommended a 10 per cent reduction of the dole—mark it, not the elimination of the dole but a 10 per cent reduction of the dole—he was denounced and read out of his party. Then there took place the most magnificent demonstration of statesmanship and courage that I have ever read about, when several boroughs in England and Scotland solicited Mr. MacDonald to come to their boroughs and stand for election; but he said, "No; I am going back home to my own people, who have read me out of the party, and I am going to make them state whether or not they disapprove of what I am trying to do to save Great Britain."

When he went back, he was elected in his own borough—the most magnificent vindication I have ever known to take place in parliamentary history—and only 55 of over 600 elected members of Parliament came back to oppose him. All the rest stood for the thing he stood for; and his fight was to reduce the dole only 10 per cent. Had it been to eliminate the dole, it would have been an entirely different proposition.

Does the Senator from Idaho wish to interrupt me now?

Mr. BORAH. No; not now, Mr. President.

Mr. FESS. On the question of the dole, I do not care for names. If you do not like to call the contribution from the Federal Government for the purpose of relieving the unemployed a dole, it is simply because under the dictionary definition it is not included in that terminology.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, now I do desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator now has come back to the subject about which I wanted to ask a question a while ago. I have not been in the Chamber all the time the Senator has been speaking. Has the Senator determined in his own mind what is a dole?

Mr. FESS. I am going to do it now.

I hold in my hand the Dictionary of Political Economy, edited by Sir Robert Harry Inglis Palgrave, published in London:

> Doles: A dole is defined by Doctor Johnson as "provisions or money distributed in charity," but the ordinary use of the term in modern times implies somewhat more than this. A dole is now generally understood to be opposed to regular or permanent help, and to be comparatively small in amount.

That element of smallness always goes with the term "dole." You say, "just a mere dole," or "doling it out."

> Doles figure largely in the charitable bequests of old time. Thus at Oxford, on St. Thomas's Day, there were given away more than 70 such, ranging in value from 13s. 6d. up to £5, and hardly any town or parish in England is without them. Every kind of condition may be attached. They are confined to freemen, to residents in certain parishes, to regular attendants at church, to widows, to spinsters, to servants, to young men, to old men, to cripples, and to the blind. The modern spirit, embodied in schemes issued by the charity commissioners, has abolished large numbers of them, but they still survive in places which resist reform. The objections to the dole system are numerous and weighty. "The practice of distributing doles," said Sir George Jessel in the famous Campden case, "should be more honored in the breach than in the observance. There is no doubt that it tends to demoralize the poor and benefit no one * * * the extension of doles is simply the extension of mischief." What are the grounds for so sweeping a condemnation? The first principle in administering charity is that it should be adequate to its purpose of relieving distress or reestablishing independence. Neither of these objects is secured by doles. They are not sufficient in amount to meet a crisis, nor continuous enough to provide for old age; in many cases it is expressly forbidden that the same person shall be a recipient on two consecutive occasions.

This is the old definition of a dole. It is to go to certain persons in small amounts, simply to relieve or prevent starvation or want.

When we come to more modern times, what are the results of the system as now pursued? This book was published in 1915, before the modern dole had shown such tremendously bad effects in England.

> What are the results of the system pursued in many cases? It is said to demoralize and pauperize. "The poor, qualified by residence in parishes in which endowments exist to receive their benefits, look upon them as a right, apply for them regularly, irrespective of need, and accept them with thanklessness.

Mr. President, that is a terrible indictment, and yet that indictment is true. The first result of entering upon contribution from the Federal Treasury to relieve local situations of unemployment, whether we call it a dole or not, is to create a disposition in the minds of the recipients which will demand it as a right. They will receive it regularly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator refers to donations from the Federal Treasury. If the donation were from the State treasury the demoralizing effect would be just as bad, would it not?

Mr. FESS. No; it will not be as bad. It has the same element, but it will eliminate first the waste that is represented by the spread from the Federal Government to the one that receives it.

Mr. BORAH. That is a different proposition; but the effect upon the individual is the same.

Mr. FESS. No; it has not the same effect. To be sure, the element that the Senator has in his mind is in it. If a man takes anything from anybody, whether it be the Senator from Idaho or the county in which he lives or the State in which he lives or the Nation in which he lives, it will have the effect, it is true, of pauperizing him if he receives it as his right and in pursuance of a duty that we have to give it to him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, assuming that there is a community where there is actual suffering and hunger, and where people are sick, and assuming that there must be help given, the Senator would, of course, not contend that there should be no help?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. BORAH. That being true, how does it affect the morals of the individual who receives it any differently coming from the Federal Government than coming from the State government? It may be that it costs more by reason of the distance from which it is administered, but I am speaking of the demoralizing and degrading effect of which we hear so much. How does it affect the citizen any more than a contribution from the Federal Government?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator certainly sees the difference between a citizen in my town receiving a contribution from the citizens of my town to relieve his situation, and his right to demand of the Government that he be supported whether he is working or not; and that is exactly what will come out of the inauguration of the Federal system of contribution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator puts into the proposition an element which I have not inserted. I am speaking of a community which is in want, which is in need, which must be taken care of, which is in a condition everybody will concede. Does it have any different effect upon the citizen himself if he is taken care of by the Federal Government than if he is taken care of by the State government?

Mr. FESS. As wide as the poles.

Mr. BORAH. What is the difference?

Mr. FESS. The difference is this, that if a person in a town meets with misfortune, whether it be through disease, or loss of health, or destruction of his property, the good people of the community come to his rescue and give him the necessaries of life. That does not make him subservient to them, and he does not take their assistance as a right he can demand of his fellow citizens. But the moment the Federal Government starts to make appropriations coming from the taxes you and I pay to take care of such people, they will come to demand it as their right, and there is a world of difference in the effect on the character of the man who receives it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a few days ago the Legislature of the State of Illinois passed an act appropriating $20,000,000 to take care of the needy of the State of Illinois. The money for that purpose will be raised by general taxation, and the taxes will be levied upon all the people of the State of Illinois. The appropriation is made, and the individuals suffering get the benefit. The money is raised by taxation. The State is acting. The State is authorizing the actions which it is necessary to put into effect in order to feed the people. What is the difference between that, so far as the effect upon the individual is concerned, and the case where the Federal Government extends relief to the needy citizen?

Mr. FESS. The difference is as wide as the poles.

Mr. BORAH. I must say that I can not see it.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio is not responsible for the inability of the Senator from Idaho to see. Every city has its hospitals. In every hospital there is a provision for people who are not able to pay for an operation or treatment, the provision being made through gratuities of the people.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is discussing something which I have not raised at all. If the Senator will discuss the proposition which I am submitting now, I think that, with my limited ability, I will still be able to follow him.

Mr. FESS. I doubt it very much.

Mr. BORAH. It may be; I have had some difficulty in understanding the Senator from time to time, but I am earnestly and faithfully trying to understand him.

Mr. FESS. I appreciate that the Senator has tried.

Mr. BORAH. I am speaking of a community which must have help in order to keep the people from starving. The State of Illinois levies a tax upon all its people.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is contending that there is no difference between a city taking care of its own and the Federal Government taking care of the people in the city; that in the one case it would have exactly the same demoralizing influence on a citizen that it would have in the other case. The Senator certainly does not think that.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not willing to discuss the proposition which I am putting to him.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio is willing to discuss any proposition the Senator from Idaho wants to put to him.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is unwilling to discuss the proposition. When I say the State is levying a tax, the Senator runs off and talks about a city, a neighbor, a hospital which has a general provision for taking care of the needy. What I am asking is, What is the difference on the individual recipient between levying a tax upon the people of the State of Illinois to take care of the hungry through the operation of the State legislature and levying a tax through the operation of the Federal Government to take care of them?

Mr. FESS. Just as much of a difference as the Federal Government differs from the State government. Does the Senator understand that?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not.

Mr. FESS. Well, the Senator from Ohio is not responsible for the misunderstanding.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator——

Mr. FESS. I do not yield further.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator does not want to——

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio does not yield any further.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator does not want to yield any further, because he has gotten to a place where he can not yield; he is afraid to yield.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, we will see whether the Senator from Ohio is afraid to yield.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. Now, tell me——

Mr. FESS. The Senator will please take his seat until I tell him.

Mr. BORAH. No; I will do nothing of the kind.

Mr. FESS. Very well; stand then. I am going to answer the Senator's question.

The Senator wants to know what is the difference between the service of a State to an individual and the service of the Federal Government to an individual.

Mr. BORAH. I did not ask any question of that kind at all. I asked what is the difference in effect upon the character of a citizen—how does it more demoralize or degrade a citizen—to receive money from the Federal Treasury than from the State treasury?

Mr. FESS. When the Senator is ready and takes his seat I will answer him.

Mr. BORAH. If my standing presence disturbs the Senator, I will sit down.

Mr. FESS. The Senator's presence very seriously disturbs me, because he does not wait until I finish my answer.

The Senator wants to know what is the difference in the influence upon the moral character of a citizen if he receives funds from State taxation or receives funds from Federal taxation. Is that the question?

Mr. BORAH. That is the question.

Mr. FESS. The difference is that the citizen receiving funds from the State taxation is nearer to the fountain where local administration is in the hands of the people of whom he is a part and who will understand his situation, and the man who receives funds from the Federal Government is receiving from a bureau operating from Washington, with no contact locally with the individual, and it leads to this conclusion—that he is the subject of charity by the votes of the people who know him, live with him, know his wants, and know how much will satisfy him, as contrasted with a bureau located in the Capital that knows nothing about him except as his situation is represented to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, the distinguishing difference is this—that in Illinois, for instance, the taxpayer would know the needy man and the needy man would know the taxpayer because he is closer to him.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose we consider the substitute which has been offered, and assume that instead of operating this matter from the Federal Government we should loan a State a million dollars, or $10,000,000, and the State should administer it. Then what would be the difference, in moral effect, between a citizen receiving the money in that way and one receiving it from Washington?

Mr. FESS. The difference would be just the same as I have mentioned. In the second place, under the substitute, the administration of the relief will be by those who have contact with the individual community, while in the case of the Federal Government it will be administered by a bureau.

I know the Senator well enough, I know his mind well enough, I have heard him speak often enough, to know he sees the difference between local relief for people we know and Federal relief administered by a bureau of the Government. The one carries with it something of the heart and soul which go out to relieve the poor. The other is merely a soulless bureau administering a fund which will be voted as a right, demanded as a right, received regularly, and will be demoralizing, as the Senator must know.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have read, and I think it is correct to say, that in a number of the cities of the United States they are now allowing $5 per week to a family of three and four. The Senator knows perfectly well that with an income that small such a family would be on the ragged edge of starvation. It is not living; it is sheer existence, and that is all. The Senator knows, furthermore, that when a family is fed in that way, as soon as disease comes in at the door they are utterly unable to resist its attack.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment. The Senator knows perfectly well that if that father and mother should receive an additional $5 from the Federal Government of the United States it would not demoralize them or degrade them; it would cause them to appreciate the great Government under which they live and for which they are willing to give their lives. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER rapped with his gavel.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator has inadvertently announced the vicious element in this proposal, too vicious for anyone to contemplate with equanimity. He specifies an amount for a family. He sits in this Chamber, distant from the point, and criticizes as he will when it comes to doling out the Federal contribution. He refuses to permit the people on the ground who are administering the money to say what is the amount that is necessary to keep the wolf from the door. He immediately makes the Federal dole a football of politics, and every community will demand in its own right the amount it specifies, just as in this city we see people finding fault and saying that they do not receive sufficient gratuities and want a politician who will popularly announce what will bring applause from the gallery, that "We want more than what those on the ground say is what the Government can afford to give."

When you open the way for that populace represented by the people to-day in the gallery to say how much the Federal Government must give to an individual out of the Federal Treasury nobody will be satisfied.

What will satisfy one will not satisfy another; and if the administration of the charity of the Government for the benefit of the needy is put into the hands of politics, that will inject the most vicious element that could creep into it.

The Senator has given expression to the very condition that all of us know will exist in the country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. There is no limit to the demands. Men out of work will hold that the Government is responsible. Men out of work will demand that the Government take care of them. Men out of work will say, "It is not my business to find work; it is the Government's business to find work for me." They will say, "The Government owes me a living. It is not a question whether I am seeking work or not, the Government owes it to me."

We have just had a demonstration of what will happen if the floodgates are opened, people breaking out in applause, violating the rules of this body, at the statement that people out in the States should have the right to say how much should be given out of the Federal Treasury. That is the element which the Senator and I do not dare open up here unless we are willing to turn the Treasury inside out for the people who are disappointed and disaffected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. FESS. I wish to read a letter at this point. This letter is written from England. It is written by one of the best educators in the world, a graduate of three American colleges, including the University of Chicago, doing post-graduate work in Italy, where the writer has spent every summer for the last 11 years:

> Why am I taking the time of a busy man to read a letter? Not a personal reason. From time to time I hear the dole mentioned as a solution of the difficult problems that are now before our legislators, and I venture to send some of the observations I have made in the nine trips I have made to England. My subject, English literature, of course, kept me there more than in other European countries. As a careful student of history and economics, you know that the present condition in England has some political and commercial foundation, but I can not help the strong conviction that the dole has greatly aided in her fall, because I have seen and heard much of the ways in which it has undermined British character. It has made paupers respectable. I have been appalled at the steady deterioration. Without exception, every person I met told me of the difficulty in getting anyone to work. Three years ago, when I was reading in the library of the British Museum, I met every day more people out of work at the gates than I had met in all Italy in four months, and they refuse to do the work that is offered them. There is now in England more work than workers. British people tell me that there is a generation of young men about 25 years old who have never worked a day and who do not expect to do so. They will not go to the colonies, because they refuse to face the work of pioneering. The dole enables them to live, to buy cigarettes and beer, so why change? I can not go into the trickeries by which the system is abused and the Government threatened. Obviously something must be done in the United States to help the unemployed through this hard year. I hope that the suggestion of the dole will be promptly killed. Its effects seem to me woeful beyond any suffering that may come this winter.

There is the statement of an unbiased observer of the operations of federal contributions in the form of a dole to people out of employment. I state again that any system that makes it as profitable to be out of work as to work should never be entered upon by this or any other country. While the pending bill does not propose to do a thing of that kind, it is the entering wedge; it is the first step which affects not alone to-day but will become fixed as the policy of the Government. Every American that cares for the history of a great country ought to stand adamant against any proposal so demoralizing, so effective in the breakdown of the moral and mental fiber of our citizenship as this would eventually be.

As I said in the beginning, if there must be some movement of this kind, the substitute which has been offered would be far and away better, because it would bring the administration of the law into the hands of the locality which understands the situation. In ministering to the wants of the people we must leave it to the people in the community. It can not be done by a bureau in Washington, for the moment we place it in the hands of such a bureau that moment we have the situation which was voiced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a moment ago. There will be no satisfaction. It will easily be demanded and people will grow careless whether they work or not, because why should they work if they can be paid as much without work as with work? If we go into the matter of how much it shall be and leave that to the politicians, God help the United States!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is to be regretted that there is a difference of view between those who have arrived at the conviction that the National Government should aid in taking care of the unemployed as to the manner in which the appropriation should be administered. Before we get through with the legislation and before it is crystallized into law, if it ever is, the real question which will confront us, and with which it will be most difficult to deal, is the question which has just been presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and that is whether we have arrived at the time when there should be any help upon the part of the National Government. That is the question upon which the success of this legislation depends.

I am not clear as to when that would be, as expressed in the view of the Senator from Ohio. I drew the inference from some remarks he made that there might come a time when the situation would be so serious and so imminent that he would be willing to waive the deep convictions which he entertains in regard to the Federal Government and its duty in the premises. I do not know, either, what the measure of proof would be as to the necessity, but I do believe that the Senator from Ohio is entirely too humane to permit the American people, or any part of them, to die of hunger and starvation rather than to give them any help from the National Government. I think I am correct in that inference, am I not? I am addressing my inquiry to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I beg the Senator's pardon; my attention was diverted.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator does not take the position that he would not feed the hungry if the necessity were shown upon the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. FESS. What does the Senator mean by "the necessity upon the part of the Federal Government"?

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the people were in actual hunger and the local authorities were unable to take care of them—does the Senator still say he would not appropriate money on the part of the Federal Government?

Mr. FESS. If the local authorities are not able to do so; but if the local authorities refuse to do it, that is a different thing.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose, then, that the local authorities are not taking care of them, that they are actually suffering; would the Senator still refuse to appropriate Federal money?

Mr. FESS. I would. I would insist upon the local authorities doing their duty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we seem to have the philosophy of the Senator from Ohio in all its naked and hideous ugliness. He takes the position that the National Government should not aid the suffering, the needy, the sick, and the diseased, even though the local government is not taking care of them.

Mr. FESS. And able to do it.

Mr. BORAH. I say that the local government is not taking care of them. Of course, if the Senator says "able to do it," I suppose he would reduce the remainder of the community to the same state of pauperization as the people who are in need. But the Senator takes the position that although there may be need, although there may be hunger, although there may be want and suffering, and though the people are not being taken care of by the local community, the Senator still would not help them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio takes the position that if the local community is able to take care of its poor, the Federal Government should not step in.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the authorities of the local community have been doing the work for two years and have now reached the point where they are unable to do it longer, would the Senator still say they are able to do so?

Mr. FESS. What does the Senator mean by the local community saying they are not able? Does he mean some body of the local community saying it?

Mr. BORAH. I mean the local community says it has exhausted its resources, its means, that it has taxed itself to the limit and can go no further, and that those authorized to speak for the community, both the city council and the State government, say that they have exhausted every resource; the Senator still would not take care of them?

Mr. FESS. The Senator would send somebody like the Senator from Idaho to make an investigation to see whether their report was correct or not.

Mr. BORAH. In the meantime the sick babies would die, families would disintegrate, disease would take its toll, while an investigation was being made by some one. Investigations have been made; the cruel conclusive facts are here at the call of every Senator.

Mr. FESS. That being done in a civilized community?

Mr. BORAH. I am not so sure about that since I heard the Senator's speech. A civilized community is a community which cares for its hungry and the sick when misfortune overtakes them instead of debating divisions of government.

Mr. President, I confess in the beginning of my remarks that I am voting for measures these days under a sort of duress, a duress superimposed by this unprecedented economic breakdown. The situation is so exceptional, the problem which confronts us is so extraordinary, that we are driven to entertain measures which in ordinary times would have no consideration at the hands of this body. We are dealing with a situation with reference to unemployment precisely in the same way that we have been dealing with the situation with reference to business. We are doing things for which there is no precedent. I venture to say we are doing things for which there is no authority in the Constitution of the United States. We are doing it for the reason and because of the fact that the situation is such that we are compelled to act regardless of precedents and regardless of authority. Self-preservation still remains the supreme law.

A few days ago we passed what is known as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure. I do not question now the necessity. I challenge any Senator upon this floor to find the slightest sanction for that measure in any authority that is given to the Congress of the United States. We pass a bill by which we take from the Treasury of the United States a large sum of money, and thereby take from the taxpayers of the United States a large sum of money, for the purpose of taking care of the private business of private corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. It has to be returned.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Utah says it has to be returned. That depends entirely upon what the future has in store in the way of recovery from this depression. It may be that not a dollar of it will be returned; we do not know; but whether it is returned or not, I challenge the Senator from Ohio to tell me by what authority under the Constitution of the United States we tax all the people of the United States for the business benefit of a few, whether it takes the form of a loan or open donation.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio will answer that the Government can issue bonds and make its loans for any purpose within the purview of the general welfare.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator from Ohio takes the position that it is not for the general welfare to keep men and women and children from starving to death in the United States?

Mr. FESS. No; the Senator from Ohio takes the position that if the Government is spending money, it should be in the form of loans, and the Senator from Idaho can not distort the application of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure into a parity with the proposal which he is now espousing.

Mr. BORAH. We have no more authority under the Constitution of the United States to take money from the Treasury and issue bonds in the hope that it may be returned than we have to make the direct appropriation itself. The issue of bonds does not change the constitutional question.

Mr. FESS. Why does not the Senator from Idaho resist the matter and take it to the courts?

Mr. BORAH. I think there is another way to resist it.

Mr. FESS. Not effectively.

Mr. BORAH. I am citing it as a precedent. At any rate I am asking the Senator now by what constitutional authority we appropriate $500,000,000 for the purpose of reviving and resuscitating frozen securities of private corporations?

Mr. FESS. That is for the general welfare under the general welfare clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Now we have come to the place where I had hoped the Senator would come.

Mr. FESS. Then I hope the Senator from Idaho is satisfied.

Mr. BORAH. The only thing we have to determine now with reference to authority to take care of unemployment is, is it for the general welfare of the United States? That is all.

Mr. FESS. It is not for the general welfare to build up a demand as expressed by the beneficiaries of this kind of a law that will destroy every fiber of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Ohio says that if we establish the precedent of taking money from the Treasury to feed the hungry, the evil consequences which flow from it will be very great, but he has helped to establish the precedent of taking from the Treasury of the United States money gathered from the whole people to take care of private business. I ask what evil consequences does he expect to flow from that action?

Mr. FESS. None. That money is loaned and will be returned, and the Government has the authority to do that. The Senator, however, proposes to give the money outright, never to be repaid, and to create a situation from which we shall never be able to extricate ourselves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Government of the United States has no authority in the world to negotiate private loans for the benefit of private corporations; there is not the slightest authority for it. The Senator can not find any authority for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law except in the law of dictatorship and of Soviet Russia.

Mr. FESS. That ought to be pleasing to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I would rather be there and not play the hypocrite than to be here and do so.

Mr. FESS. The way is open.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to call his attention to still another thing that the Senator from Ohio advocated? In order to take care of suffering and starving people, the Senator from Ohio is ready to loan money to the banks and railroads and insurance companies and other corporations, and he justifies it on the ground that it is going to be repaid. So the net result of his philosophy is to take care of those who are able to give security and to let those starve who do not have any property upon which to give security.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I recognize the fact that in dealing with the business situation, perhaps, it was necessary for the Government to do something; I am not complaining of the measure which was enacted; if it shall bring any relief I shall be glad to know it. However, what I am complaining of is that men who voted to take money out of the Treasury of the United States to revive private business are now unwilling to take money out of the Treasury of the United States to preserve human life when we know it to be imperiled. I say there is a philosophy there which is materialism on one side and humanity on the other. I contend that this Government of ours, the Federal Government included, was created to take care of its citizens when in distress, whether they have a dollar or not, and simply because people to whom we would loan money have left sufficient frozen securities to satisfy us that they can repay does not meet the contention at all. We owed a duty to them, the business men, we will say, but we certainly owe a duty to the 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 people who, through no fault of their own, have reached a point where they are on the verge of starvation. Like business they must have help.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Idaho is proposing to change the whole theory of government. Heretofore we have always supposed that the people should support the Government, but the Senator from Idaho is turning it about so that the Government must support the people.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there was a time when the governmental philosophy prevailed that the Government should never favor the people or support the people or aid the people, but that the people should always support the Government. However, that passed away with the American Revolution. We lodged governmental powers in the people of the United States. This is their Government. It was made for them. They defend it upon the field of battle; they give their lives for it; and when distress comes the Government owes something to the people.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me further?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. All that the Government should do, and all that it has ever attempted to do, is to preserve the liberty and keep open opportunity of the citizens under its flag to make the most out of their lives. The Government was never intended to be the almoner, to bestow gifts and gratuities upon individuals. The Government is organized and conducted to protect individuals in their rights, and not to support them. Individuals ought to support the Government instead of the Government supporting individuals.

Mr. BORAH. If the individuals are to support the Government——

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Why did not the Senator say to the banks and corporations of the United States who were on the verge of failure, "Go back home; resuscitate your own frozen assets; take care of your own private business; this Government was not made to support the people; indeed not, but the Government was created to be supported by the people. Therefore, you bankers and corporate interests go back home and take care of your own business; this is a private affair; this is an individual affair." Why did not the Senator say that to them?

Mr. FESS. Because that does not cover the subject. The Government can make loans to——

Mr. BORAH. I say the Government can not make loans for private purposes to private individuals.

Mr. FESS. The Government does not attempt to do such a thing. The Government makes loans to enable other agencies to employ American labor and to invest American capital, but the Government never did make loans to individuals. The Senator wants to make loans to individuals. We have always avoided putting the Government into the banking business, but when the Government supplies funds to resuscitate the employers of labor, it is doing so not merely in the interest of the particular industrial organization but it is doing so for the purpose of securing employment for labor that otherwise might be out of employment. In doing that the Government has a function to keep open the opportunity for labor to be employed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator has just said that loans were made and appropriations were made to enable corporations to employ citizens.

Mr. FESS. To employ labor.

Mr. BORAH. To employ labor. Then the Senator does believe that the Government of the United States should move to enable the people out of employment to be employed?

Mr. FESS. Certainly; but that is a different problem from that on which the Senator is speaking.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the Senator finds a group of people—we have about 8,000,000 now out of employment—suppose he finds a group of 4,000,000 people who can not find employment, for whom there is no work, who are as good citizens as ever trod the soil of the United States, who are out of work and can not find it—what would the Senator do with them?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio would have the Government, to the limit of its ability, make it possible for those people to be employed. If it can not do so, then the people amongst whom the suffering ones live ought to be sufficiently humanitarian to see that they can bridge over the period of unemployment. The Government itself tries to give employment in a limited way in construction and reconstruction work, but that is as far as it can go. The Senator, however, wants the Government to step in and take care of people who are not employed by donations of money from its Treasury.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what I am contending for is to place the individual human being upon the same level with the corporations and banks and railroads of the United States; nothing more.

Mr. FESS. Then the Senator would loan to every human being who wants money?

Mr. BORAH. I will venture to say that 90 per cent of the people who are out of employment to-day would be perfectly willing to give the United States Government a guaranty that they will pay back every cent loaned. They abhor charity.

Mr. FESS. And the Senator would make the loan?

Mr. BORAH. I would. I would feed them in any way practical.

Mr. FESS. There is where the Senator and I differ.

Mr. BORAH. I would save human life.

Mr. President, as I understand, it is generally admitted that there may come a time when the Government of the United States will have to help. The President in his message of February 3, 1931, said:

> I am willing to pledge myself that if the time should ever come that the voluntary agencies of the country, together with the local and State governments, are unable to find resources with which to prevent hunger and suffering in my country, I will ask the aid of every resource of the Federal Government, because I would no more see starvation amongst our countrymen than would any Senator or Congressman. I have the faith of the American people that such a day will not come.

Mr. President, according to the President's view at that time—and I have no doubt the President's view at this time—if the time comes when local authorities are unable to take care of the situation, the President is in favor of the Federal Government assisting. It is purely a question of fact and a question of policy.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have no right to speak for the President, because I do not know what his view is, but I assume that he would not take the position that the Federal Government should render assistance directly to the individual; but, on the other hand, he would more likely have assistance rendered through the States. I know nothing about what he would say, but that would be my opinion.

Mr. BORAH. Then, if the Senator does not know anything about it, it is not worth while to stop to discuss it.

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. BORAH. I am speaking now of what the President himself said:

> I am willing to pledge myself that if the time should ever come that the voluntary agencies of the country, together with the local and State governments, are unable to find resources with which to prevent hunger and suffering in my country I will ask the aid of every resource of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I think that is sound doctrine; I think it is a humanitarian doctrine; I think it is a doctrine which we could all afford to accept and live up to; and I think it is a doctrine which will preserve every scintilla of the principles which the Senator from Ohio advocates which he ought to retain—he has some which he ought to get rid of.

Mr. President, the question, then, is, What is the situation in this country? From the President down, all agree, with the exception of the Senator from Ohio, that if hungry people are amongst us who are not being taken care of, the Federal Government should take care of them. This leaves the sole question, one of fact—is there necessity? I contend there is great necessity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. How would the Senator and how would any of us determine whether the time had arrived described in the President's message? Would the Senator place upon the Federal Government the duty to ascertain the localities wherein that situffation existed, or would he place the burden upon the authorities of the local communities to advise the Federal Government as a matter of initiative that that time had arrived?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the President had in mind as to arriving at a conclusion. What I was going to undertake to say was that the evidence is ample, it is overwhelming, that the time has arrived when, as the President said, if there is suffering and hunger, we should take care of it. That time has arrived, according to the facts, which can not be disputed and which have not been disputed. If that is true, Mr. President, we are here advocating precisely what the President announced as a doctrine in 1931. I am willing to rest my case on the facts.

Let me call attention to a statement by one of the most distinguished social workers in the United States, a man who has devoted practically his life to suffering humanity, who is asking no favor from the Government and does not need to, who was in this work long before the present depression came upon us, and who studied the subject when unemployment was a disease of our industrial system and also after the depression. He says:

> For 130 of these 144 cities we have data comparable with last year, which show an increase of 14.3 per cent in funds raised. This and presumably far more than this is for relief purposes. Yet relief demands in every American city show an increase quite out of proportion to this gain. Philadelphia's relief expenditures during September of this year were 404 per cent above September, 1930, Chicago's 267 per cent, New York's 125 per cent, Cleveland's 134 per cent, St. Louis's 214 per cent.

We have in those cities an increase of donations or an increase of privately contributed support of 14, 20, or 25 per cent; we have an increase in the demands for relief of from 125 to 404 per cent. The Senator from Ohio knows what that means to thousands and thousands of American citizens. He knows that they are living without sufficient food, without sufficient clothing; he knows that when they are sick they lack sufficient administration from those who could take care of them. We can take those cold figures alone and determine for ourselves whether countless thousands and even millions of American citizens are being properly clothed, fed, and taken care of.

But let me read further from his statement:

> The minimum relief accorded a family of five by the family society of the Federation of Jewish Charities is $21.97.

Ordinarily they allow these families of five $21.97 per week. What kind of a living do you think that is? It is just about all they can do to get by upon that amount; and that has been the minimum which these societies had been allowing for years before this depression came. It was found to be the least upon which they could preserve life and possibly health. What is the situation now?—

> The minimum relief accorded a family of five by the family society of the Federation of Jewish Charities is $21.97, divided as follows: Food, $9.25; lunches, 60 cents; rent, $5.77 ($25 per month; 5-room house); light and cooking, 69 cents; clothing, $2.92; household supplies, 35 cents; car fare, 90 cents; incidentals, 64 cents; coal, 85 cents (on a weekly basis throughout the year).

Then he says:

> This is not guesswork; it is based on the most vigorous studies of what is needed to keep body and soul together; to keep health from being impaired; to conserve what we do not want to see broken down in family life. The relief available and distributed by our emergency unemployment relief committee, which now has under its care 35,000 families, is so far under this standard of adequacy as to be self-evident. It has amounted to $5 per week for a family of five, for food only. No provision is made for any of the other items in the above schedule, with the exception of milk, which is granted only when necessary.

Witness after witness went before the committee and stated these facts.

I do not think it is the province of the National Government to wait until people are actually dying. I do not think it is humane to undermine the health and the physical stamina of these children and cripple them for life before the National Government acts. I think that when a condition has been reached such as has been indicated here, where the local communities and the States have been taking care of the situation for two years, and where now the best they can do is to allow $5 a week, every plea that humanity could possibly urge is now asking for some help from the Federal Government.

I take the position that the Federal Government is just as much interested in its people, in their health, their development, their mentality, and their morals as the State government itself; and when the time comes that these are being undermined or being destroyed, it is the duty of the Federal Government to assist.

The Senator from Ohio spent considerable time on the subject of the dole. He left the floor without defining the dole. Nobody has been able or willing to define the dole. Even in England they disagree as to what is a dole. There is no proposal here to provide for unemployment insurance. There is no proposal here to pay a stated sum to individuals, regardless of whether or not they are in actual need. There is nothing proposed in the nature of a dole such as they have in England. We are doing precisely the same thing that is being done by the State of Illinois, the State of Pennsylvania, the State of New York, and other States. We are simply undertaking to take care of a crisis which has been superimposed by conditions which are under the control of no one, and therefore leave thousands and millions of our citizens unable to take care of themselves.

There is not the semblance of a dole here. If it be true that that is a dole, then the State of Illinois is paying a dole, and has been for a year and a half. The State of Pennsylvania is paying a dole, and other States are paying doles. So far as the dole is involved, there is no difference between a contribution which comes from the Federal Government and a contribution which comes from the State government. There may be, as a matter of policy, reasons why the Federal Government should wait until the State governments have done their best. I agree with that as a matter of policy; but so far as the definition of a dole is involved, a payment is just as much a dole when it comes from the State of Illinois as when it comes from the Federal Government. It is a mere question of policy as to when it is wise for us to act.

I grant that if the local authorities are able to take care of this situation, if the State governments are able to take care of it, the counties and the cities, I do not want the Federal Government to appropriate; but I am convinced that there is widespread and terrible suffering in this country. In some places the situation is beyond description. Thousands and millions of homes in this country, formerly owned but now only occupied by good American citizens, have not had a day free from care and actual want for from 18 months to 2 years. Disease is now visiting those homes and taking away the children by reason of the undermined physical condition of those children. I am not willing, out of a superstitious regard for the responsibility of local government and the responsibility of national government, to refuse to do my duty to humanity.

When the actual crisis is here, where there is hunger, and local authorities are unable to cope with the problem, that distinction has no more to do with the situation than social precedence would have upon a sinking ship at sea. I ask my friend from Ohio to bear in mind that this is not a local condition. This unemployment comes from national causes, from an international situation, from international conditions, and from national conditions. It has been superimposed upon the working people of the United States through forces over which they had no control. In my opinion, the evidence shows beyond a question that it has pushed many of the people of the United States to a point where they actually are being depleted in physical and moral stamina, in health, and in character.

The Senator from Ohio is greatly disturbed for fear American citizens will come to like the dole, and refuse to work. He said what to me is a most startling thing coming from the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee of the Republican Party, and that is that the American people can not be fed when hungry because, if we do feed them, it will undermine the character of the people so that they will not go back to work when they have an opportunity to do so.

With all due respect to the Senator from Ohio, I denounce that as a slander upon the American people—a self-reliant self-helping people. Ninety per cent of these people would return to work to-morrow, scorn our charity, and refuse our gifts if we would give them an opportunity to work. Because they are down, because they are in trouble and in misfortune, it does not become a Senator in the Senate of the United States to say that we dare not feed the hungry, lest it undermine character.

The Senator refers to Great Britain. I wish the Senator or some one else would tell me what he would have done had he had 2,500,000 men out of employment in Great Britain. Would he have fed them? There is no State government there behind which to hide. Would the Senator have let them die?

What would have been the result in Great Britain? Lloyd George and other public men said that it was either a question of feeding or revolution. Great Britain, true to the British character, and with the background of British history, took care of her people. It was the humane, also the wise thing to do.

It is said that they granted a dole. When their depression came, they had a system of unemployment insurance. Of course that system broke down, as great corporations in this country are breaking down; but then the Government came in and undertook to feed these people. It could not do anything else. Great Britain is in a serious condition now; but she would have been in an infinitely worse condition had she said, "Let these people die."

Mr. President, this is a practical proposition. Theory disappears when people are hungry. We may call it a dole, but they call it something to eat; and it is immaterial what we call it so long as life is preserved.

I am interested in preserving the lives of these people. We may call it a dole, or call it what we will, it does not change the actual fact, and that is that the great Government of the United States is undertaking to see that its own people do not starve.

I know that it is often said, and we read, that unemployment conditions in this country have been greatly exaggerated. Let us not delude ourselves. Nothing will be gained by refusing to see things as they are. Nothing will be gained by refusing to deal with realities.

I have read almost in full the hearings taken before the committee of which the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is chairman. That committee did a fine and helpful thing in bringing out the real facts. If anyone thinks conditions have been exaggerated, let him read these hearings. Let him acquaint himself with the facts stated by men and women who are devoting their lives to suffering humanity. I do not believe he can help being convinced that the condition is just as serious as it can possibly be, that thousands of lives are in the balance.

I do not believe conditions have been exaggerated. I do not believe conditions could well be exaggerated. I sometimes doubt if the Great War itself, with all its suffering and sacrifices, entailed greater misery, more agony of heart and mind, than these long, fateful days in the aftermath of war.

It is true that the great armies of Europe left in their wake the maimed and the dead; but who can paint the picture of the desolation and ruin, the blasted hopes and broken lives, behind this great army of the unemployed—an army now 8,000,000 strong in our own country, perhaps 20,000,000 strong in other countries; an army which has its recruiting stations in almost every country under the sun?

No, my friends; conditions have not been exaggerated. The human brain never coined terms sufficient to paint the picture as it is, much less to exaggerate it. With millions of men and women asking for bread, asking for work, compelled to live upon charity, praying that these lean days may have an end, clinging to hopes which often fade with the night, there is, there can be, no exaggeration. The human tongue is inadequate to the task.

In the face of these appalling conditions, what shall we do? What must we do? If the situation has gone beyond the control of the local authorities—and I believe it has—we have no alternative. We must assist as intelligently and economically as we may, but we must assist. We can not permit men and women and children to go hungry. If a precedent is wanted, we will make a precedent. We do not stop in these days for want of a precedent. We no longer respect tradition in matters of legislation. To repeat what I have already indicated, if you tell me by what authority you take money out of the Treasury of the United States to rescue and revive frozen securities of a private bank or a private corporation, I will tell you by what authority we may take money from the Treasury of the United States to rescue from the clutches of disease and death freezing children. If you want to speculate upon the evils which may flow from giving aid to the hungry, may I ask: Did we speculate upon the evils which may spring from a precedent to rehabilitate private business from the Federal Treasury? If you say it is unconstitutional tyranny to take from one group of citizens through the power of taxation and turn it over to another group of citizens through the power of appropriation, I ask you: What kind of constitutional tyranny is it by which you tax the whole people to rescue the business of a few people? If you say that in dealing with these business matters we did so because we had reached a national crisis, my answer is that when 8,000,000 people are unemployed, when millions go hungry because local authorities are unable to feed them, we have reached not only a national crisis but a national calamity. I do not mention these things in the way of criticism, but rather to accentuate the proposition that we have reached the point in dealing with this question of unemployment and in feeding the hungry where we must do what we did in the business world—determine what it is necessary to do and do it.

When millions are in distress there is no time to divide legal heirs between the north and northwest side, no time to speculate about whether it may work injuriously to the character of the citizen. Let us first save the citizen, save life, and we will meet the future with its problems when it arrives. I am not inveighing against the Federal Treasury trying to save business in a supreme crisis. But I grow impatient with those who have run counter to all precedents, to all traditions, to all constitutional sanctions to save business, but tremble with patriotic wrath and grow indignantly constitutional when help is sought for those upon whom the whole fabric of our civilization rests. We have reached the point, it seems to me, when we must determine what are the needs of our unfortunate people; and having determined their needs, we must go forward and administer to them as best we may. Business was in distress. It called for help. It said it was not able to take care of the situation itself. The Government of the United States stepped in and loaned it its credit, appropriated money, and took care of it because it was in distress.

Now 8,000,000 people are unemployed; they are in distress; the local authorities are not taking care of them; they have done bravely, but it has become a national problem, a national question; and the National Government, as in the business matter, should step in and take hold and assist in taking care of those people.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read an editorial from the Dayton (Ohio) Daily News from the pen of Walter L. Locke, an editorial writer, who, I understand, is the editor of one of the papers of Mr. Cox, former Governor of Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[An editorial from the Dayton (Ohio) Daily News, from the pen of Walter L. Locke, editorial writer]

BUSINESS RELIEF

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill—business relief—has gone to the President and received his instant signature. Within six weeks of the presentation of this measure of business relief, Congress has passed and the President has signed it while the entire country looks on and applauds.

This measure puts an injection of half a billion dollars of Government money and a billion and a half more of Government-guaranteed credit into the arteries of business. Banks and insurance companies with frozen assets will find blowing over them the warm breath of Government credit and Government cash. Hard-pressed railroads will receive Government aid. Frozen real-estate securities will be thawed in what is to be essentially a Government mortgage market. With this help of legislation, of Government, prices are expected to start upward—the prices of commodities, of bonds, of lands, of stocks. The Government's measure may not succeed in all this, but the country hopes it will and approves the effort. If it succeeds, the depression is in hand.

Now, while we view so admiringly the strong action which, with big and little business insisting and consenting, the Government takes, let us pause for a little smile at ourself. The smile may best be introduced by a remark which that wild "radical," Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, dropped in casting his vote against the measure now a law. Senator NORRIS said:

"I have been called a socialist, a Bolshevik, a communist, and a lot of other terms of a similar nature, but in the wildest flights of my imagination I never thought of such a thing as putting the Government into business as far as this bill would put it."

The words of the insurgent Nebraskan are true. He got himself written down a radical for insisting that the Government operate a little power plant which it owns at Muscle Shoals. He has variously favored public operation of a public utility here and there. But put the Government in control, through a control of money and credit, of all the business of the United States—such a thing as that the Nebraska radical, now a conservative protesting against the radicalism of his stalwart associates in Congress, never dreamed of. This is what has just been done.

We had to do it. The country was in a jam. Only the Government, it seems, can break the jam. And so, under the leadership of the President who vetoed Senator NORRIS's Muscle Shoals bill as a violation of "rugged individualism," individualism is laid on the shelf and the most completely communistic measure ever adopted in time of peace passes hurrahing into law. It's all right. We had to do it. But as we do it, let's smile at ourselves; it will keep us sane. Let's smile at our "rugged individualism," at our insistent demand that the Government keep out of business; and especially, as we set out now by law to increase the price of everything, let us smile at our old opposition to "price fixing." And as we smile, can we complain if over at Moscow, which we refuse to recognize because of its socialism, there are a few smiles more?

Smiling at ourselves, we can see why the farmers smile, the farmers we so sternly rebuked with vetoes, Mr. Coolidge's at Mr. Hoover's advice, for wanting to be helped by law. Remember how long we stood out against the sinking farmers—12 years. And when it was ourselves struggling in the water, how long was Government relief in coming? Six weeks! Oh, there's very much to smile about in this connection; and, finally, when any of us hereafter in horror cry socialism at anything it will be more than a smile, it will be a snicker.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand it, the pending amendment is the substitute which has been offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may state that the amendments first to be considered are the committee amendments to the original text. The text must be perfected before an amendment is proposed as a substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to offer an amendment, action on which will take precedence over the vote on the substitute. I want to offer an amendment to the original text. I will offer it, have it printed, and ask that it lie on the table.

So that Senators may understand the amendment I am about to offer, I would like to state that I have taken out of the so-called substitute the provision for a road-building program, and I am offering that provision as an amendment to the text of the pending bill. If adopted, it will necessitate some slight changes in verbiage, which will be easy to make after its adoption, if it shall be adopted. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I hesitate to put an anticlimax upon this discussion, but there are a few basic facts which I think should be made of record before the vote upon the pending bill is taken.

In the first place, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. FESS) has drawn the untenable distinction that it is all right for the States to levy taxes for the relief of the starving and the unemployed, but that it is wrong for the National Government to do the same thing unless the States are unable entirely to handle it. I want to call attention to the difference between taxation by the States and taxation by the National Government. I want the record to show who is taxed in the two instances.

Under the State government the tax is upon the property of all the people, and upon the incomes, sometimes, of about all the people. But who is taxed by the National Government? Fourteen per cent of our taxes are levied under tariffs. There are some excise taxes upon tobacco and things of that kind, but most of the taxes are the corporation and the individual income taxes. Those taxes are paid by about two and one-half million people in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator give us the percentage of the total Federal taxes paid in the way of income and corporation taxes?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is about two-thirds, as I recollect it. About two and one-half million people are paying taxes, and out of that number there are not over 1,000,000 who are paying any substantial sum. The other million and a half pay very small amounts into the National Treasury. So, when the Senator from Ohio speaks of protecting taxpayers in the appropriation of this money for the relief of the unemployed, he is talking about protecting in the neighborhood of a million people in the United States, and that is all. The other 122,000,000 are not considered.

Let us see who those million people are. Have they received any dole from the Government of the United States? Yes. We just appropriated this $2,000,000,000 dole, five hundred million of it to be paid at once and fifteen hundred million more to come along as they demand it, for loans mainly to railroads and banks.

Is that all the dole we have given to this million people by the laws of our country? No. In the first place, we have turned most of the business of this country over to that same million people through the interstate commerce laws. Before the war 85 per cent of the railroad business of the United States was interstate, and since the railroad legislation enacted there was an increase in the average freight haul from about 275 miles to 317 miles, so probably there is a bigger percentage to-day than there was before the war. That probably is an index of the business of the whole country. These million people, who take these gigantic incomes from the people of the country, do it, in large part, through the favors given to them by our interstate commerce laws, our railroad laws, and our other laws.

Is that all the dole we have paid to these million people who pay income taxes into the Federal Treasury? No. We have given them a tariff dole. We have levied tariffs for their protection, and we have raised the prices of our protected industry products by four or five billion dollars a year, a dole which the American people must pay to them, and which results in the big profits which are the basis of their incomes.

Those are not all the doles, either. Those people are constantly coming to the Government of the United States for aid and protection. The railroads came in and got their bill for 5½ per cent return upon their property investment, with seven billions and more of water in that investment.

All the time, when these million Federal taxpayers have spoken, and when they have asked for aid and assistance from the Government they have received it. But when we speak of the common people, when we speak of those who are unemployed, then it is a mysterious crime to appropriate anything from the Federal Treasury, because these same million big income taxpayers, taking the profits of practically the whole country, will have to pay for that support of the starving people.

Mr. President, in 1930, a year of depression, the National Industrial Conference Board found that we had a national income of $71,000,000,000. It was not much less in 1931, but I have no estimate for that year. But 1930 it was $71,000,000,000, which means about $580 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, or about $2,900 for each average family of five. In that year of depression, 1930, we had enough national income, if it had been properly distributed under the laws of the country, if it had not been distributed by these special favors and laws which have been granted, so that nobody would need to starve or be underfed or not clothed or not housed. But through favors given in various ways to the great corporations and the great combinations of the country that income was not distributed to all our people and the same corporations discharged their employees to protect their earnings.

Mr. President, big business in the country has public reviews of business conditions in the newpapers, but it has private agencies which advise it of the actual facts. It does not want the country to know exactly what is going on, and so this double source of information is developed. I have here one of the confidential advices as to conditions of American business in 1931, which says:

> The most challenging economic statistics of the depression are that, in spite of the fact that production volume and wage payments have gone down together to barely more than half of predepression volume, the grand total of interest and dividend payments have been maintained higher than for any year prior to 1929. Even the dividend payments of railroads for this year have exceeded those for 1928 and for any previous year in railroad history.

Mr. President, these million big Federal taxpayers in 1931 collected more interest and more dividends than in any year of our history except 1929. This is the confidential advice on the situation given them by one of their own correspondents, one who is able, I have no doubt, to tell the truth in reference to the situation.

It would be all right to go out into Iowa or into Illinois and levy a tax upon the farmers of those States to relieve the unemployed, according to the principles laid down by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to-day, and I presume he is speaking for what we call the "stand-pat" leadership on the Republican side of the Chamber. It would be all right to do that, but to levy a tax upon these incomes of interest and dividends, which in a year of depression are the second greatest in all history, would be an evil proceeding for the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, about three-fourths of the expense of government in this country is local. About three-fourths of the taxes levied are State, municipal, and county taxes. The Federal Government expense is only about one-fourth of all of them. Therefore the big burden is already upon the local and State governments. I can not subscribe to the theory that the American citizen is not a citizen of the United States as fully as he is a citizen of his town, his county, or his State. He is equally a citizen of all, and the Government of the United States owes him the same consideration as do those other governments.

The tax burdens have grown heavy. I picked up a paper from my own State the other day, a paper which fights me viciously all the time. I found page after page of delinquent tax sale advertisements in that county. I picked up a little paper from my own home county and found 24 columns of delinquent tax sales advertised. Each two lines in those columns represented a farm or a piece of town property. Such things were unknown in our country up to the time of this depression, and yet the Senator from Ohio would have us levy more taxes upon those people for the purpose of relieving the starving in the community in order to protect the 1,000,000 of income-tax payers who pay taxes into the Federal Treasury and who all these years have profited enormously.

Things have reached such a stage that at this moment there is a rebellion in 12 counties in the State of Iowa. No State of this Union is more loyal to the flag. No State has more freely contributed to the support of the Government than Iowa. Yet the situation has reached such a stage that in 12 counties where tax sales and foreclosure sales were offered, great mobs showed up with ropes and pitchforks, and nobody would bid upon the sales, either mortgage foreclosure or tax sales. That is the condition of the most loyal people of this whole broad country. It is brought about by this same 1,000,000 Federal taxpayers who pay taxes into the Treasury of the United States.

There is one part of the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] with which I do not agree. He says we are not responsible for this condition; that it is beyond our control. I concede that it has reached a stage so that now it is beyond the control of even the men who instigated it and brought it about; but, Mr. President, these conditions, the depression itself, were produced by the misdeeds of those same million taxpayers who pay taxes into the Treasury of the United States. It was those same million men who watered their stocks, who inflated values, and then sold them to the people of the country, robbing them of their earnings and savings, inflating those values in a way unknown in the history of our country or of the world, into a bubble that burst and finally destroyed all our prosperity. It was those same people who loaned the millions of our savings to foreign countries where they are now uncollectible. It was the same people in control of the National Government who made Government loans to foreign countries.

All those things combined, together with laws of discrimination in favor of railroads and against agriculture, in favor of the protected industries and against labor and against agriculture, brought on this greatest depression in the history of the world. The main responsibilty for all of these conditions lies with the same million men whom the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] likes to defend as the income-tax payers of the country, because they have the whole income of the country.

So far as I am concerned, I take a positive delight in taxing that money back to the people where it belongs. I go farther than this matter of mere emergency. I do not care by what name it is called, I do not care how radical it may be pronounced, I say that every citizen of the United States, every able-bodied citizen who is able to work is entitled to a job. I say the $70,000,000,000 national income owes him a job. I say that the same million taxpayers who pay their income taxes into the Federal Treasury have refused to provide that job for him. They are the men who control the business of the country. It is the duty of the Government to provide that job since they have failed.

Nobody believes in a dole as such. I do not want to see a dole provided to keep men in poverty and want. Nobody wants that. But when men are starving they must be fed until they can get a job. I do not care whether it is called a dole or what it is called, they must be fed, and in the end the final remedy for the situation is to provide them a job. These great taxpayers of the country having mismanaged the economic affairs of the Nation, having created the greatest economic failure in all human history, perhaps are powerless now, having overstepped their bounds, to provide jobs. Perhaps the Government alone is the only institution that can provide the jobs. I therefore am favorable to the road-building measure proposed by Senators on the other side of the aisle. That will help a little through providing jobs for the unemployed—though not much—because it is not strong enough. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in his able address yesterday pointed out that the States are spending a billion dollars a year on hard roads. In the last two years they expended more than a billion dollars each year. The Federal Government itself started the hard-road construction program. It started it by saying to the States, "Come along and we will contribute 50 per cent of the construction," but it was only a little while until the same million big Federal taxpayers became dissatisfied with the arrangement, and then they came out to my State and to all the States and organized "road-booster" associations. Those boosters got out and yelled for county bonds and State bonds, for gasoline taxes, and everything that was local, but they never once asked the Congress of the United States for an increase of the Federal appropriation. Finally the chairman of the committee in the House, Mr. DOWELL, got it increased by $50,000,000 up to $125,000,000 two years ago.

During the last two years the States, spending more than $1,000,000,000 for those same roads, got assistance of but $125,000,000 from the Federal Government. The States also spent almost another billion dollars upon secondary, most of which were post roads, and got no aid from the Government. Every one of those roads is an interstate road, every one of those roads is a post road, every one of those roads is a military road for the use of the Government of the United States. Every one of them ought to have been half paid for at least out of the Federal Treasury. But because of this defense of the Treasury in behalf of a few men who contribute to its support, the State appropriations and State expenses have climbed up into the sky while Federal appropriations have remained almost stationary. I would, therefore, like to see a substitute, something in the form of the amendment which will be offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], added to the proposal of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], and the two together adopted.

I do not like the Shylock scheme of lending money to somebody in order to relieve starving people in the various States. I think it is an insult and contrary to the real genius of the Government of the United States to lend it on the theory that we will get it back. If we want to lend it to anybody, then let us lend it to the starving people themselves.

So I feel that that portion of the substitute should be eliminated. If that can be done, then, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote for the bill as presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, with an amendment that will include a provision for road improvements.

The only objection to the road provision is that it only provides for the expenditure this year of $125,000,000. It all ought to be expended as soon as arrangements can be made, and new roads and new improvements should be inaugurated, so that the Federal Government may come somewhere near paying its half of the construction of hard roads.

The Senator from Ohio said that if we once embarked on this method of contributing aid from the Federal Treasury, then there would be other groups and institutions to come forward and demand relief. Mr. President, I do not care how many groups come forward to ask for Federal relief, if it is just and right that they should have it. It is no excuse for failing to do our duty in one instance that there may arise other occasions perhaps in which we also ought to do our duty.

Think of the great national income we have, anyway, which is available for taxation. It amounts to $71,000,000,000 in times of depression and to $90,000,000,000 in ordinary times of prosperity. That is sufficient to enable us to procure funds with which to perform all our duties; there is not one of them that we need neglect, but we can fail to do our duty and by so doing protect a few big income-tax payers, who number, perhaps, less than a million in the whole United States.

The Senator from Ohio says the groups will become powerful and will be enabled to control the Government. Who, Mr. President, is controlling the Government now? Where does this Government get that sort of inspiration at this time? There is evidence of it on both sides of the Chamber in this discussion. The Government is controlled now by the million big income-tax payers, and they are also the ones who contribute to the campaign funds. I might add that they contribute impartially to both parties; they are nonpartisan all the time, because they want to control both sides of the aisle.

The Senator from Ohio referred to the old argument that there were certain soldiers who resented the enactment of the law providing soldiers' pensions, and cited their attitude as a reason why relief to the unemployed should not be voted. Mr. President, I do not doubt there were some soldiers of that kind, but those soldiers were generally the same big income-tax payers, and their pretended patriotism was a fraud and a sham. They resented the paying of pensions in order to protect their incomes rather than for any patriotic motive. One of the economic crimes of our country has been the refusal to do economic justice to the soldier who was willing to lay down his life for his country. Every time we have been engaged in war we have turned loose the same big income-tax payers; we have let them go out and earn millions and billions out of the blood money of war, and then have come back and said to the soldiers: "You are not patriotic if you demand a pension or an economic reward of your own." I do not belong to that school; I belong to the school that is ready to bring the income-tax payers to the bar of justice and levy taxes upon them in order that there may be distributed amongst the people some of the profits which through the combination of such taxpayers have been unjustly taken from the people.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] asks where I get the figure of seventy-one billion as being the national income. I get it from the estimate of the National Industrial Conference Board, which is a board of big business men in New York, who are very scientific about the study of these questions, and I have usually found their statistics accurate. Of course, we have the Federal estimates of the national income before the depression, and we had an income of about $90,000,000,000 from 1923, say, up to 1929. That would mean, in ordinary times, an income of $750 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, or $3,750 for each average family of five. This national income is sufficiently great to take care of the present situation, depression and all.

Depressions are a result of the autocratic control of the finances of the country by about 1,000,000 men who pay income taxes into the Federal Treasury. There would be no depression if it were not for the autocratic power that big business has of discharging its men in order to protect its earnings and even, as I have shown, to collect more interest and more dividends in 1931 than in 1928.

I might say also, Mr. President, in this connection that the net income of the United States, the wealth increase, runs about from $15,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000 a year over a long period and on an average. That gives an index as to how special privileges are given to great combinations of capital. Keeping that idea in mind, our net income, after deducting all our operating expenses, our living, the waste due to competition, and everything else, is only about 4 per cent a year on the capital investment of our country. That is all there is for distribution—a little less than 4 per cent in a series of years.

We have distributed a lot of the income to individuals in a wasteful and extravagant way; they have taken far more than they ought to have taken; there is left about 4 per cent for capital, and that is all there is left. As that is all we have in this American pool of production for distribution, when a great corporation or a great combination is organized and sent on its way to fight for 5 per cent or 10 per cent or 100 per cent, if it succeeds, it is going to rob some other block of capital, to say nothing of the rights of individuals. The result is, Mr. President, that just a few have succeeded, and they are usually the big combinations.

Former Senator Pepper of Pennsylvania, once a distinguished Member of this body, said that 92 per cent of American business ultimately fails. I fear, Mr. President, that the percentage is going to be a great deal higher than that before the present depression shall be over. Just a few of the great combinations survive and succeed. It is because of such organizations, engaged in economic warfare constantly, that we have these ups and downs of American business.

I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I had placed on the wall of the Senate Chamber a few days ago a chart showing 50 years of American business. In that 50 years there were eight major depressions. The chart was made up by a big business man, Col. Leonard P. Ayres, and there is no doubt about its accuracy. I repeat, there were eight major depressions and seven little ones thrown in for good measure, and during the whole 50 years there could not be found 30 minutes when we were actually normal. We were either going up into the skies of inflation or dropping down into the ocean of depression. It is largely because the Senator from Ohio wants to protect a million big income-tax payers and because we refuse to require justice of them in distributing back the earnings which they take from the people of the country that we are confronted with the situation which exists to-day.

Every corporation organized in any State is a special privilege guaranteed by the law and by the Government itself. It combines men and their capital together and gives them a special power that the individual does not possess. We talk of individuality in the United States. Individuality was buried when corporations were first created. The individual has nothing to say about it; he does not even vote in the corporation; capital alone votes and controls it.

Mr. President, Congress generally does not create the great corporations; they are usually created by State laws; but the Congress permits them to engage in interstate commerce. I have estimated that business transacted in interstate commerce in the United States is more than 85 per cent of the total business of the country and that the profits derived from such business are more than 85 per cent of all profits gained in the United States.

Interstate commerce is under the regulation and control of Congress, but we have not regulated or controlled or said one word about the profits the corporations engaged in such commerce shall charge the people of the United States, first, for the privilege of being combined together in great aggregations, and, second, for the privilege of operating in interstate commerce amongst all our people. We have omitted such regulation entirely, and they have gone ahead, gathered in their earnings from the people of the country, hoarded them, collected them in a few places, and the result has been depression after depression. They cared not, because they could discharge their men and save their fortunes. They broke down agricultural prosperity in order to get cheap raw materials for their factories, and in that way came out in the end with greater fortunes than they had in the beginning.

Much has been said here about the ability of the great cities to take care of their unemployed. I am not going to dispute that such is the case. I think the city of Cleveland is very able to take care of its unemployed. If we levied a Federal tax, I think the city of Cleveland would pay of that Federal tax, with its big income-tax payers and great assets, more than it would get back; I think there can be no doubt of that; but a large part of those men are contributing nothing to private charity.

Mr. President, I feel, anyway, that private charity is a disgrace to a country such as the United States of America. With its normal $90,000,000,000 of national income we ought to have no use for a Red Cross at all; our people ought to be employed so that there will be no necessity for charity of that kind; and they would be employed if adequate taxes were properly levied and properly distributed back to where they would protect all the people.

The State of New York, it is said, pays 30 per cent of all the taxes received by the Federal Treasury, but those taxpayers of the State of New York consist of a few hundred thousand individuals, and those same few hundred thousand individuals, who pay their tax into the Federal Treasury, are earning profits off the people of the whole country; their businesses operate everywhere; and yet they settle down in Westchester or some other place far removed from the suffering and starvation which we find all over the country. But the Senator from Ohio thinks it is a bolshevistic proceeding if we tax them in order to relieve the same people whom they have robbed of their earnings by this process.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FESS. There are 33 letters from cities in the State which the Senator so ably represents in the Senate. The letters were written in answer to Senator LA FOLLETTE's inquiry. Of the 33, 23 are openly opposed to what the Senator is now advocating; 4 of the 33 are for it and 6 are noncommittal. Does that represent bolshevism?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; that represents Mussoliniism. [Laughter.] Of the two and a half million people in Iowa, I think probably there would be found about half a million of them who pay the principal part of the taxes, who might take the Senator's view on this subject. There would be two million on the other side of the matter.

It is not any trouble for these 1,000,000 big income-tax payers to reach out in the State of Iowa and every other State and secure the assistance of little financial leaders everywhere. We have only about a dozen big financial men in the whole State, although we produce more out of the soil than any other spot on this big, round world.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. These cities are represented by their mayors. I should think the mayor of a city would be a responsible person; and the cities are the best in the State of Iowa, as the Senator will note, including the university city of Ames, the city of Cedar Rapids——

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the worst city we have. That Cedar Rapids gang is the worst gang in the State.

Mr. FESS. Council Bluffs, Des Moines, Fort Dodge, Keokuk, and cities of that sort. I think the Senator's town is Ottumwa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I do not live in any town. I live out in the country.

Mr. FESS. The Senator lives near a town.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but I live in the country.

Mr. FESS. We would know that.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator can tell that by looking at me.

So, Mr. President, we have our standpatters in Iowa just as they have in Ohio; but they are not as numerous in Iowa as they used to be, and they are not as numerous in Ohio as they used to be.

I was just down in the State of Ohio. In a great hall out there, I faced 5,000 soldiers, most of them unemployed, demanding the cash payment of the bonus which the Government has admitted it owes them. I know that those were just as honest people as any people in this world. I know that they served their country faithfully; and, as far as I am concerned, in addition to this relief, here is one of the evil things the Senator predicted that I want to propose right now. I am ready to pay every one of them that bonus out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. FESS. There is no doubt about that. I knew the Senator would be.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, in Iowa, for instance, there is a big syndicate of newspapers, the Lee syndicate. It is a Wall Street crowd. It is financed and controlled by the big crowd so as to influence public sentiment. If the Senator from Ohio wants to find out what genuine Republicanism is in Iowa, who is a genuine, reliable Republican, he ought to go down to the Davenport Times, the biggest one of this Lee syndicate, and he ought to talk there to E. P. Adler, and he will get the genuine, Simon-pure stuff. Then if the Senator from Ohio wants to find out what is a genuine, Simon-pure Democrat, let him walk two or three blocks across to the Davenport Democrat and talk to the same E. P. Adler. [Laughter.]

That is the situation in the United States Senate. Here is the Republican whip on this side of the Chamber standing up for this million of Wall Street taxpayers. "We must not touch them. They are sacred. It is against the Constitution and morality and everything else to tax those fellows, and their $2,000,000,000 is not a dole." Then the leader of the Democracy, on the other side of the aisle, gets up and joins right in with the Senator from Ohio. [Laughter.]

It is this bipartisan economic situation that I am ready to overthrow in the United States. It has ruined my State, in spite of those newspapers. They have helped do it. It has ruined the common people of every State in the Union. We generally talk about New York and put the blame on New York, but only a little part of New York is to blame—only Westchester and Wall Street and a few places like that.

The common people of New York are just like the common people of every other State. I met them face to face. I have talked over these problems with them. I know that they feel the same way about them that they do in the State of Ohio and in the State of Iowa; and I hope they are going to be pretty well represented in the United States Senate in the vote on these bills. At any rate, Mr. President, this plan of keeping the Government out of taking care of its own people is the most sinister foundation for autocracy that has ever been laid in any country of the world. That is where it leads. It means the end of our democracy if the people of this country can not talk directly to their Government and ask them for the relief to which they are justly entitled.

The Senator from Ohio thinks this thing ought to be done by community drives. Mr. President, this matter of an organized community drive is the most demoralizing idea ever developed in any country in the world. This thing called private charity weakens the moral power of every person who has to ask for it. You may have no rights of charity against your neighbor. He may not have robbed you of anything. There may be no just claim for him to put up charity to you; but when the Government of the United States permits great, organized corporations to take charge of its interstate commerce, when the Government of the United States levies tariffs to protect the great industries of the country, when the Government of the United States passes a railroad law and puts into that law a command to its commission to give a return of 5¾ per cent upon the capital investment, and that fixed with seven billion or more dollars of water; when the Government of the United States passes a $2,000,000,000 bill, appropriating at once $500,000,000 of it out of the Treasury to relieve these railroads and to relieve these banks; when the Government passes a reserve bank law that creates a great banking institution overhead with a reserve board appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate—when the Government of the United States does these things for a few of a privileged class in the United States it is a disgrace on that Government to permit a situation where a community drive of charity will have to be organized at all. That Government, with this great national income of from seventy to ninety billion dollars, owes it to those people to see that they get their share of it for the work they do; and it owes a job to every man who is willing to work and able to work. Of course, those who can not work must be cared for otherwise.

The big things of this country are mostly in the National Government. There are only a few States that have them. There are about 10 States that would not get back on this kind of a tax as much as they have paid. There are about 10 of them that would pay the excess that was necessary for the other States. Even Ohio is not one of those 10. I figured out this bonus; and if that were paid, the State of Ohio would get $10,000,000 more than it would cost that State. There are, however, 10 States that would pay more. Those are the same 10 States where these 1,000,000 big income-tax payers live, and they are the ones who take the profits from the people of the whole country. It is not right to say the 10 States pay it; the million profiteers would pay the taxes.

American civilization can not go on, we can not continue forever forward in this direction that has destroyed agriculture, dragged it down, brought 30,000,000 people to the verge of bankruptcy, turned seven or eight million men out of their jobs, and said to them, "Look to the Red Cross or look to a community drive for jobs and for something to eat." That can not go on in this country. I say to the Senator from Ohio that when he hears from the people of his State in the next election, the theory that he has advocated here to-day will be repudiated by a majority that he can scarcely count.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first committee amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	Keyes	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	King	Shipstead
Barbour	Fess	La Follette	Smith
Barkley	Fletcher	Lewis	Smoot
Bingham	Frazier	Logan	Steiwer
Black	George	McGill	Stephens
Blaine	Glass	McKellar	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Glenn	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Townsend
Brookhart	Gore	Morrison	Trammell
Broussard	Hale	Moses	Tydings
Bulkley	Hastings	Neely	Vandenberg
Bulow	Hatfield	Norbeck	Wagner
Byrnes	Hawes	Norris	Walcott
Capper	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hebert	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Howell	Patterson	Waterman
Coolidge	Hull	Pittman	Watson
Copeland	Johnson	Reed	Wheeler
Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ark.	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the committee, which the Secretary will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment of the Committee on Manufactures is, on page 5, line 20, after the word "apportioned," to insert the words "or allocated," so as to make the subdivision read:

(c) The amounts apportioned or allocated to any State under this act shall be available for payment to and expenditure by such State, for the purposes of this act, until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act; except that at the expiration of the calendar year 1932, if the amount certified prior to the expiration of such year for payment to any State out of amounts apportioned on the basis of population under this act in the manner hereinafter provided is less than one-half of the total amount apportioned to that State on the basis of population, the difference between the amount so certified and one-half of the total amount apportioned shall be added to the reserve fund and shall be available for allotment to the several States on the basis of need.

Mr. COSTIGAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for nearly half an hour,

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

(Mr. COSTIGAN's speech is published entire in the issue of February 11.)

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order. If there be no reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of members of the Federal Farm Board.

Mr. McNARY. For the day, I ask that these nominations may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will go over.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT

The Chief Clerk read the name of Ogden L. Mills, of New York, to be Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the confirmation of Mr. Mills, but it seems to be an appropriate opportunity to make a few remarks in regard to the resignation of his predecessor and his appointment as ambassador to Great Britain.

When Mr. Mellon was appointed as our ambassador to the Court of St. James President Hoover issued a statement which was printed in all the newspapers of the country. In it the President gave as his reason for appointing Mr. Mellon to that post that, under world conditions as they now exist, he needed the greatest mind and the greatest statesman he could find anywhere to fill that place. He said, practically, that under existing conditions a superman was needed at the Court of St. James to represent us as our ambassador, and, in effect, gave that as a reason for the appointment of this great statesman to fill that place.

When I read the President's statement, assuming that he meant what he said and realizing that Mr. Dawes had just retired from the position which was being filled by the appointment of Mr. Mellon, I wondered what Mr. Dawes thought of that statement. I wondered if in taking his place as the head of the great Reconstruction Finance Corporation which we have set up Mr. Dawes fully realized that he had been demoted, and that the reason for his demotion was that he did not measure up to the standard outlined by the President when he appointed Mr. Mellon. Subsequent events following rapidly convinced me that President Hoover in addition to his other great qualities is also a great humorist and that Will Rogers will have to look well to his laurels. It seemed from the statement of the President as to the qualifications under existing conditions necessary for our ambassador to Great Britain that really to have the position filled properly he ought to have resigned and have accepted the position himself.

Soon after this appointment was made we really saw, as the whole country saw, what seemed now to be the admitted condition of things, and could understand why Secretary Mellon was transferred from the great and responsible position which he had so long held to this one of lesser responsibility, because, as we all know, our ambassadors aside from their social activities are merely figureheads. The Secretary of State cables the ambassador that he must present a communication to the government to which he is accredited and then proceeds to dictate just what he shall say. The ambassador copies it, signs it, and presents it. When he receives the answer he remains perfectly silent until he has cabled the answer to Washington and Washington has cabled him back and told him just exactly what he shall say. So, as a matter of fact, one of the bright boys acting as a page, disregarding, as I have said, the social requisites of an ambassador, could perform the duties equally well with the "greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton."

That reminds me, Mr. President, that a noted Pennsylvanian a year or two ago wrote a book in which that phrase was first used. In that book he said, "Mr. Mellon is the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton." When I read that eulogy I wondered why he excepted Hamilton, because everybody knows that Secretary Mellon has a distinction and the honor that has come to no other man on earth—he has had the honor of having three Presidents serve under him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is aware of the fact, I presume, that that appellation or description has been changed. Instead of Mr. Mellon being described as the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton, he is now described as the greatest Secretary of the deficit since Hamilton.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I still think the first appellation was probably appropriate, and I think the other one is also appropriate. He has been the greatest Secretary of the Treasury in prosperity and the greatest Secretary of the Treasury, so far, in depression.

Mr. President, soon after the nomination was made the newspapers began to say that the reason Secretary Mellon was appointed was because he was unable longer to perform the duties of his arduous office, and they went so far as to comment editorially on the fact that for some time he had not, as a matter of fact, been doing anything in the office, but that the work had been performed by Mr. Mills, and in order to give Mr. Mellon an easy job and let him down lightly, and to treat him with respect, he was given the position of ambassador to London.

Mr. President, I can not help but sympathize with Mr. Mellon, after his distinguished services; and I can not help but say, "Poor Andy." After he has been in command of the great political forces of three different Presidents, to be thus cast aside and pushed off his throne is something that, in my judgment, ought not to occur. Poor Andy!

A bright newspaper man last night over the radio told us that Mr. Dawes had left his knee breeches over in London, and that Andy was going to wear them when he got over there. Think what a spectacle he would present standing on his diminutive pipestems in Dawes's breeches in the presence of aristocracy in the greatest diplomatic center on earth! [Laughter.]

A great man once said that anyone who could make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before was a benefactor of the human race. My judgment is that Andy will not wear Dawes's breeches, but, following in the pathway of the man who made two blades of grass grow where one grew before, he will take a pair of his trousers and cut them in two slightly above the knee and thus have two pairs of trousers where only one existed before.

At least, Mr. President, it seems to me, under all the circumstances, that the President has not treated this man with the respect with which one of his long service ought to be treated, in trying to get rid of him in the manner that has been represented to the public by the knowing ones, who freely talk behind closed doors as to the reason why this great change has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Ogden L. Mills to be Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am requested by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to deliver a message at this point. He desires that I shall say to the Senate in his absence that, with or without a record vote, he desires to be recorded as opposing the confirmation of Mr. Mills. I do not know his reasons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Mr. Mills? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Senate advises and consents to the nomination; and the clerk will note in the Journal the objection of the Senator from Louisiana.

UNDER SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Arthur A. Ballantine, of New York, to be Under Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Mr. Ballantine? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Ogden L. Mills, of New York, to be Secretary of the Treasury, and of Arthur A. Ballantine, of New York, to be Under Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection.

Mr. NORRIS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Charles A. Patton to be United States marshal, district of Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

INTERNAL REVENUE BUREAU

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Gerald A. Jewett to be collector of internal revenue, district of Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Fred A. Bradley to be collector, customs collection district No. 9, Buffalo, N. Y.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that action on this nomination be deferred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that the postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, all nominations of postmasters on the calendar will be confirmed en bloc. That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] very generously yielded for this executive session. I hope he may be recognized in the morning; and, as in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, February 11, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 10 (legislative day of February 5), 1932

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Ogden L. Mills to be Secretary of the Treasury.

UNDER SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Arthur A. Ballantine to be Under Secretary of the Treasury.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

Charles A. Patton to be United States marshal, district of Colorado.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Gerald A. Jewett to be collector of internal revenue, district of Iowa.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art absolutely pure, breathe into our souls a love for Thee, for one another, and for mankind. Thou who art marvelous in mercy, in patience, and in long suffering for our sake give us a deeper insight into Thy holy nature. If any are adverse to one another, be their friend; if the shades of trouble are about, be their light; if others are stingy of their joys, be our comforter; if there is no compass to direct the way, be their leader. Bless us abundantly that our souls may be rich in God. Do Thou answer every longing for knowledge, every yearning for wisdom, and all that springs forth from hearts overflowing with love. So direct us in the labors of this day that we shall not look back upon it with any vain regret. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JULIA FARRELL

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 134

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to Julia Farrell, widow of Thomas F. Farrell, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to six months' compensation and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray funeral expenses of said Thomas F. Farrell.

The resolution was agreed to.

INVITATION TO CONGRESS TO ATTEND CELEBRATION AT ALEXANDRIA, VA., FEBRUARY 22

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, Judge SMITH, who represents the Alexandria district, I desire to transmit to Congress an invitation from the George Washington Birthday Association, of Alexandria, Va., to attend their ceremonies on the afternoon of February 22, 1932, at 2.30 p. m. They will be glad to have the Members and their friends attend these ceremonies.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of invitation may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY ASSOCIATION,
Alexandria, Va., January 19, 1932.

To the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Alexandria, Va., celebrates on February 22, 1932, the bicentennial of the birth of Gen. George Washington.

Following a custom of very long standing, a parade of military, civic, and fraternal units will be held at 2.30 p. m. on that day.

It is our pleasure to extend to your honorable body an invitation to be the guests of our association and lend your presence to the fitting observance of the birth of our illustrious citizen.

Yours very respectfully,
GEORGE WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY ASSOCIATION,
By M. E. GREENE, Secretary.

AMENDMENT OF THE RADIO ACT OF 1927

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. DAVIS (when the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7716) to amend the radio act of 1927, approved February 23, 1927, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 47, ch. 4), and for other purposes, which is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7716, with Mr. GLOVER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, this is a rather lengthy bill, and so far as I know there is no opposition to it. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one hour.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, this bill, H. R. 7716, amends the radio act of 1927, approved February 23, 1927, in several different particulars, and also has an additional provision which I shall later discuss.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the last Congress unanimously reported a bill embracing substantially the same provisions as are contained in the first 12 sections of this bill, and the bill as reported unanimously passed the House. The bill in substantially the same form was reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce, but never did come up for action in the Senate.

The first 12 sections of this bill embrace various amendments to the merchant marine act of 1927, designed to clarify and simplify administrative, procedural, and appeal matters.

As we are all aware, both the science and the industry of radio has developed very rapidly, more so than any other industry we have had. While the 1927 law apparently covered the situation which could then be foreseen, yet in the light of actual experience, as well as scientific and other developments, it is made apparent that it will very much help the situation, promote efficiency, more orderly administration, and more fully protect the rights of all interested if the law is amended as proposed in this bill.

The bill, in its entirety, has the unqualified indorsement of the Federal Radio Commission and their counsel.

With respect to appeals, for instance, the provisions dealing with that subject in the original act were rather general in their terms, and it developed that questions arose that resulted in a difference of opinion as to interpretation. In these proposed amendments we follow substantially the same procedure with respect to administration and appeals as is provided in the interstate commerce law, in so far as it may be made applicable.

To go somewhat more into detail, I will state that none of the provisions referred to change substantive law relating to radio. It is more a change of language and of method than anything else.

Taking up the first section of the bill, this is simply a proposed amendment to insert the words "the jurisdiction of" before the words "United States," in line 8, page 1.

Then, in section 2, there are excluded from the zone system and the equalization provision of the act the Virgin Islands, Porto Rico, Alaska, Guam, Eastern Samoa, and the Hawaiian Islands, for the reason that it is considered they were so far removed from continental United States that they can be assigned facilities that will more fully provide for them, and at the same time not interfere with the stations in the United States. However, the law in all other respects is made applicable to these Territories and possessions of the United States.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. What change is made in the zoning of the States of the Union?

Mr. DAVIS. None whatever.

Mr. PARSONS. In what respect is this bill different from the previous zoning provision?

Mr. DAVIS. There is no difference whatever, except to exclude these island possessions and Territories of the United States, together with Alaska, from the application of the zone and equalization provisions.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I was hopeful that the gentleman and his committee would consolidate the Radio Division in the Department of Commerce with the Federal Radio Commission and have one radio bureau or activity of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to state to the gentleman from Texas that I am fully in accord with his idea, and the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the last Congress unanimously reported such a bill transferring the Radio Division to the Radio Commission, and it unanimously passed the House. Such a bill has passed the Senate at this time and has been referred to our committee, but we did not include that in this bill for the simple reason that opposition has developed to it and we wished first to put through what we conceive to be an important bill, without any highly controversial features in it.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will bring out and pass that Senate bill to consolidate, because you now find the anomalous situation where the Radio Division of the Department of Commerce, for instance with respect to matters in Texas, will send its inspectors from New Orleans to Texas to inspect radio stations, and they make complaints not to their division but to the Federal Radio Commission, and then you have the Federal Radio Commission, a bureau entirely distinct from the one making the complaint, holding the hearings on such complaints.

Mr. DAVIS. In my opinion, there is no question but that placing the radio division under the Federal Radio Commission would make for both efficiency and economy.

Mr. BLANTON. Both efficiency and economy; yes.

Mr. DAVIS. And better cooperation.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman one further question? In my judgment there ought to be some steps taken to provide proper radio stations in the different parts of the State outside of the big cities. The big cities are gobbling up all of the stations of any importance. For instance, in my State, the big State of Texas, the large cities of San Antonio and Houston and Dallas and Fort Worth are gobbling up all the big stations, and you find it almost impossible to get a station away from them that is over 250-watt power.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, that is a matter well worthy of consideration, but does not relate to the provisions of this bill.

I may say in passing, however, naturally one reason the larger stations go to the cities is because it is necessary for the radio station to furnish an acceptable program to the public, and naturally there is more talent and more support for a station in a city than there is in a small town.

Mr. BLANTON. But I am sure the gentleman does not think along the lines only of the city population and forget the country population.

Mr. DAVIS. I think my attitude on that question is pretty well known to the older Members of the Congress. I have made a fight for years for an equal distribution of broadcasting facilities between all the zones and between all the States within a zone. [Applause.] I had the honor of preparing and introducing a bill, which Congress by a very large majority passed, designed to insure that situation. Of course, we all admit that the situation is not perfect, but we are all working to that end, and hope that the Federal Radio Commission will.

Unless there is a desire on the part of the Members to hear a detailed explanation of this bill, I shall not take the time to do that. The report is available, and the report does make an explanation of each provision of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman, in just a brief word, tell us what the difference is between the present law and what is contemplated by the present bill; in other words, what is the crux of the change that it is proposed to make?

Mr. DAVIS. As I have just stated, the chief changes are amendments clarifying and making more definite, and we think more efficient, the provisions in the law with respect to administration and procedure on appeal.

Then, in addition to that, we have made the change that I have noted with respect to our island possessions and Territories.

The amendment to section 3 provides for a fixed term for the chairman, instead of leaving it indefinite, and also provides for a vice chairman to perform the functions in the absence of the chairman.

Section 4 of the bill amends paragraph (f), section 4, by omitting the words "in the character of emitted signals," and inserting after the word "unless," in the sixth line, the words "after a hearing." Those omitted words do not properly belong in that paragraph, and besides they have fallen into disuse. The other change requires a hearing in the case stated.

Paragraph (k) of section 4 is amended by setting forth more particularly the procedure under which the commission shall conduct the hearings. The amendment authorizes the holding of public hearings and provides that they may be held at any designated place.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether in this bill there is contemplated any drastic or revolutionary change in the law.

Mr. DAVIS. No; there is no change in the substantive law, unless section 13 might be so termed, which provides that no person shall broadcast a lottery, gift enterprise, and so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the desire of the gentleman to explain amendments in answer to interrogatories as we go along, or would he prefer to wait until the bill is taken up under the 5-minute rule? I wish to direct at some time an inquiry as to paragraph (k), section 4, authorizing employees of the commission to take testimony rather than have it confined to the commissioners, examiners, and officials.

Also as to that particular change in the administrative law exempting witnesses from the defense that the testimony will incriminate them. For instance, declining to testify on the ground that it might incriminate them and relieve them of the liability if they do so testify.

Mr. DAVIS. That is in accord with the laws and regulations in other activities—for instance the Interstate Commerce Commission—in their investigations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman prefer to have the inquiries made under the 5-minute rule?

Mr. DAVIS. It is agreeable to me to do so. I have intimated that I would not take the time in entering into detail explanations unless it was so desired. It seems that it is desired, from the inquiries being made, and therefore I shall be glad to proceed.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. HORR. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not it was in the minds of the committee, and they had any deliberations on the granting of wave lengths?

Mr. DAVIS. This bill does not change the fundamental law upon that subject.

Mr. HORR. Then that was not an object of deliberation on the part of the committee?

Mr. DAVIS. No; not in connection with this particular bill.

Mr. HORR. The object of my question was whether it had been brought to the attention of the committee that one or two companies have absolute control of the air in my region?

Mr. DAVIS. I will state that these matters have been before the committee many times, and several years it reported to the House a resolution directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the subject of radio monopoly. The resolution was adopted; the Federal Trade Commission made an exhaustive report, and so forth.

Mr. HORR. The most recent demonstration has been brought to the attention of the committee where the National Broadcasting Co. has attempted to form a new chain, which, if completed, will control 75 per cent of the airways on the Pacific coast.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is true now that the chain stations already control more than 75 per cent of the cleared channels.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman has alluded to other considerations than this measure.

Does the committee contemplate bringing in future bills which will have to do with the assigning of wave lengths, or in any way creating a monopoly in the control of the air by certain chain stations?

Mr. DAVIS. I will say that the committee contemplates giving further consideration to various subjects relating to radio, but I am not prepared to state whether the committee will bring in bills. I can not speak as to that.

Mr. PARSONS. That has not been under consideration by the committee as yet?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, those particular features have not been considered this session by the committee, but they have been under consideration by members of the committee, including the chairman, and the chairman is now preparing an additional radio bill.

Resuming the explanation of the pending bill, section 5 is a little different from the other matters I have discussed. This authorizes the commission to require painting or illumination—it is misprinted in the report—illumination of radio towers if in its judgment such towers constitute, or may constitute, a menace to air navigation. I think the purpose of that is manifest. It is simply for the protection of public life, and as the Federal Radio Commission has jurisdiction over broadcasting stations and their apparatus, it is the proper body to regulate that subject.

Section 6 amends section 9 by eliminating the Territories and possessions from the zone system, as was done in section 2 in another connection, to which I referred.

Section 7 amends section 10 of the act by clarifying the purpose of the first sentence in the section. Provision is also made for the issuance of license renewals and modifications, without formal written application in cases of emergency, but for terms no longer than three months. This latter provision is incorporated in order to cover emergency permits to vessels at sea.

Now, with respect to the first sentence referred to under the present law it is not specifically provided that the Radio Commission may suspend a license, and there has been quite a controversy as to whether the right to suspend was included in the higher right to revoke, and so forth. So in order that it may be clarified, we amend it so as to include the word "suspend," and for the further reason that the commission says it is frequently in the interest of justice that they be permitted to suspend rather than to revoke a license, because the offense may not be sufficient to warrant revocation, and also they may not be acquainted with all the facts, and they may desire to simply suspend the operation of the station until they have sufficient time within which to obtain all the facts.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. SWING. Under this power of suspension I would like to know whether the gentleman and his committee favor constituting the Federal Radio Commission a censor of language and the truth of statements made over the radio, or whether or not that ought to be left to the States under laws similar to those governing libel and slander and indecent publications.

Mr. DAVIS. The present radio law specifically provides that the Radio Commission and broadcasting stations shall not have the right of censorship. However, I want to state that some confusion has arisen in the public mind on this ground. They have refused to grant renewal of licenses perhaps because that station was broadcasting speeches or material which the commission conceived to be distasteful to a large portion of the public. The Supreme Court has held that that is not censorship; that they do not censor; they do not pass upon anything as broadcast; but when a station over a period of time has been permitting the broadcasting of programs of any kind, that the commission has a right to take that into consideration in determining whether or not a renewal of that license is in the public interest or necessity.

Mr. SWING. They also suspend. The Federal Radio Commission, for all practical purposes, does exercise the power of censorship, and I would like to know whether the gentleman favors that?

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman is not in agreement with the Supreme Court in its interpretation in that regard.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is there any provision for an appeal from this suspension?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that one of the provisions of this bill makes it definite and specific that any aggrieved party or interested party shall have the right of appeal from any action of the commission. That is not clear under the present law.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Should there not be some provision by which a station could give bond and then appeal, to determine this question? When they are once suspended that practically ruins the station forever. It seems to me if there was some provision by which they could give bond until they had a hearing upon the appeal, it would be better.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, they may now, under certain conditions, but even after this bill is enacted they may, which, however, is within the discretion of the court to which the case is appealed.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If a station is suspended for a couple of weeks, it is very difficult for it to take its position again.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, it is not nearly as difficult as it would be if the commission revoked their license, which they now have the right to do.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman has referred to the fact that there is a right of appeal, which is ample security to any licensee against improvident action by the Radio Commission; but is it not a fact that the right of appeal is denied upon that which is the most important element of such controversy, namely, the question of fact? I can appreciate that from the very necessities of the Government, findings of fact by the Interstate Commerce Commission must be accepted, because the judicial branch of the Government could not possibly review long proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission; but why, in this vital matter of censoring—because in the last analysis that is what it is—of the greatest medium of communication of thought which exists in the world, should not the licensee have the right to go to the court of appeals upon questions of fact as well as questions of law, especially as the questions of fact are the largest part of any such controversy?

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that that subject for many years has had a great deal of consideration, discussion, and investigation by the committees having jurisdiction over this subject in Congress, and the committees unanimously reached the conclusion, and Congress has unanimously enacted a law, fixing the right of appeal as it now exists. The reason for it was this, as we viewed it: Any question relating to a broadcasting license is not confined to the interests of a particular station. It affects others. In other words, matters of interference enter into it. Nobody, no matter how wise he may be, can get the entire picture of the whole subject by studying the record in some particular case. It is absolutely essential, because of the natural limitations and because of the scientific features of radio, that some tribunal have the right to grant these licenses in connection with the granting of them generally; and while it is doubtless true—and, so far as I am concerned, I am certain it is true—that the present commission has made many mistakes, yet we were of the opinion that there would be less abuse by reason of lodging that discretion in them than there would be to permit some court which, perhaps, would try a radio case once in six months or once in a year, and then have before it only a picture of that particular case and that particular station.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will pardon one further question, does not that reflect upon the capacity of the judicial branch of the Government and lodge a very arbitrary power as to a matter that affects millions and millions of people in the mere governmental bureau? Is it not a fact that in any event, whether this section was in the law or not, the court would naturally pay the greatest respect to the findings of fact of the executive commission? And is it not also a fact that if the Federal Radio Commission arbitrarily attempts to suppress a station or the right of free speech over that station, that the court has no power at all except upon a few questions of law which are generally not in dispute, because the controversy turns upon the question of fact, and under the law the door is practically shut to a judicial inquiry?

Mr. DAVIS. If it appears to the court that there is a clear abuse of discretion, they have that right.

Mr. BECK. The court has that right?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BECK. The bill as you report it is that the court shall be limited to questions of law and that findings of fact by the commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive. To my mind this is only one more evidence of the trend on the part of the Government to transfer judicial functions to the executive departments. And let me say to the gentleman that Lord Chief Justice Hewart of England has written a book called "The New Despotism," and I commend it to the distinguished chairman and his committee, because it shows how thoughtful men in England and America are viewing with apprehension this transfer of judicial power, involving the most sacred of the rights of the individual, from the judicial branch of the Government to some bureaucratic tribunal.

Mr. DAVIS. In the first place, there are analogies for this; and in the second place, as I have said, the members of the committees having jurisdiction of this subject reached the definite conclusion, in the light of decisions which have been rendered by the court, that the courts had no conception, and could not have from the record in a particular case, of the effect of their decisions and dealing with the subject from the general viewpoint.

Radio is different from any other subject we have. A station transmits its signals for an indefinite distance. The signals themselves are transmitted many, many times further than the audible program, and yet those signals, even though unheard, play havoc with other stations. Therefore it is absolutely essential to have a proper regulation of these things by some authority who has a picture of the whole subject and has a knowledge of what stations are within the range of these heterodyne signals either because of geographical location or kilocycle separation.

I am as impatient of bureaucratic abuses as is the gentleman from Pennsylvania. However, it is admitted that some tribunal must regulate radio, otherwise there would be absolute chaos. The Federal Radio Commission consists of five members, one from each zone, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

There are so many things that enter into this that we who have undertaken to study this subject have reached the conclusion that it can not be reasonably and practically handled in any other manner.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly would not have the court, on appeal, try the case de novo and determine the facts from witnesses; it is merely an appeal on a record made by the commission. Sometimes it takes months for these appeals to be perfected and to reach the court. It takes months for the court to hear it. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that such a station should be allowed to continue to operate unlawfully and broadcast matters that are improper while the appeal is being perfected? I want to suggest that to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS. I have now found the provision which the gentleman from Pennsylvania read in part, and in part only. Here is all of it:

> Provided, however, That the review of the court shall be limited to questions of law and that findings of fact by the commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive unless it shall appear that the findings of the commission are arbitrary and capricious.

This is in accordance with law in existence in almost every State of the Union and I think it is sufficient protection. As I said at the outset, we who have undertaken to devote our very best energies and efforts to a study of this problem, which is one of the most complex problems we have, have definitely and unanimously reached the conclusion that this is the wisest way to handle the situation, and much wiser than if you give a court unbridled authority to undertake to determine a matter when it is impossible for them, in one appeal case, to do so.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Gentlemen, I must decline to yield further, because I have already taken up so much time, and there are other members of the committee who desire to be heard. The gentleman can get time under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. CELLER. I wanted to ask about short waves.

Mr. DAVIS. In view of the fact that the different changes are set out in full in the report, in accordance with the Ramseyer rule, and an explanation given in the report of each change, I must conclude my remarks with an explanation of the only thing that is new, and that is section 13, which forbids, in effect, conducting lotteries over radio stations. In other words, this section simply provides that the Federal Government, which has assumed the responsibility and obligation to regulate radio, shall not permit these stations, licensed by the Federal Government, to violate the laws of the United States and of every State in the Union. I have heard of no opposition to this from any source, and, in fact, I have heard of no opposition to any of the provisions in this bill, except one man engaged in the radio industry suggested that it might possibly be a hardship on a station to compel it to illuminate the towers as a protection for aviators.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield on that last section?

Mr. DAVIS. Very briefly.

Mr. CELLER. What is being done with reference to these foreign radio broadcasting stations that broadcast lotteries and games of chance? Is there any method, by virtue of international comity, by which we can get after such foreign stations?

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, we have no jurisdiction over stations outside of the United States. Matters are being considered along that line and, in fact, Senator DILL has introduced a resolution requesting the State Department to call a conference to reach an agreement between the United States and Mexico and Cuba. I will state that I have an amendment, which I may probably embrace in the next bill, designed to remedy that situation in so far as it may be possible to control the situation, but it is a pretty difficult thing to do. The Post Office Department has issued fraud orders against mail from the United States addressed to those stations.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill have just been exhaustively and clearly explained. The purposes have been developed and questions with regard thereto have been answered. There is nothing on the substantive merits or the provisions of this bill that I can add that would not be mere repetition.

I wish to state that this bill in every provision, save one, was reported unanimously by the committee in the last Congress and passed this House unanimously in the last Congress, and was unanimously reported by the Senate committee, but failed of enactment by reason of lack of opportunity for consideration. Every amendment in the bill has the support of the Federal Radio Commission and the support of every one interested in radio. I have not heard a word of opposition to any feature of the bill from any source.

The bill largely deals with the simplification of procedure and the expedition of business. There is no change in the substantive provisions of the radio law except the new paragraph which prohibits the broadcasting or advertising of lotteries, to which the radio interests give their unqualified consent; and it is not in the sense of censorship that this provision is sought but because it is unfair, grossly unfair, to permit, in the event they should avail themselves of the absence of a prohibition, radio to advertise a lottery when, if a newspaper attempts to do the same thing, it is unmailable.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I have had a good many complaints from constituents in my State on certain character of radio advertising. Did the gentleman's committee give any attention to that?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not in this bill. This bill contains only matter that is absolutely uncontroversial and is necessary for the proper administration of the radio laws. This question that the gentleman refers to will receive consideration and be taken up in course of time in a form which will enable free and full discussion and not impede or interfere with these changes in procedure which are so necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The gentleman is familiar with the radio law and the powers of the commission. Does not the commission have authority to regulate the character of advertising that goes over the air?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The commission has the right of granting or withholding or canceling licenses for broadcasting of all radio programs; the canceling of all broadcasts if they are not in the public interest. It has no specific authority to censor, but in the application of these broad general powers it is within its discretion how far it shall go.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. So that if a radio station persists in sending out what the commission considers as objectionable advertising, the commission could refuse to renew the license?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Absolutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under existing law any licensee whose license is revoked may appeal to the various district courts of the United States. Under the proposed bill you are seeking to confer that right of appeal only upon the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. That is for the obvious purpose of uniformity of decisions.

Now, if the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is going to be vested with this sole authority of appeal, then I will reiterate the criticism raised by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], as carried in the proviso, page 14, whether the appellate court should only pass on questions of law and be obliged to accept the findings of fact when supported by substantial testimony. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raised a very important question, which the gentleman from Tennessee attempted to answer. Under the existing practice, we have the various district courts who might pass upon one question, and if we are going to have a specialized court in the District that will become fairly acquainted with radio matters, why should we confer on the commission the sole determination of questions of fact?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Let me say to the gentleman that when the law was first written nobody supposed that the provision of allowing appeals to the court would vest that court with the exercise of anything but judicial functions. I think the gentleman will agree that the practice of exercising administrative functions rather than judicial functions is a bad practice. I do not care whether it pertains to radio or any other subject. This provision only carries into effect what we intended in the original law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raised the question that we were taking away judicial authority and vesting it in the commission, only having the court pass on the bare fact of the findings of the commission, and whether it is supported at all by any testimony.

Mr. LEHLBACH. We are not taking away any judicial functions; we are taking away the administrative functions, which never were intended to be conferred upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that we are taking away judicial powers from the court and vesting them in the Radio Commission. The attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was diverted while I was interrogating the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I may give the gentleman a further illustration. We have a situation where the appellate court is precluded from going into questions of fact. We frequently have cases where the findings of fact are not reviewable by the appellate court, save where they disregard all law and reason and there is abuse of discretion.

Most of us have had experience in immigration cases, where there may be a question of life or death—the question of deportation.

Those findings of the board of special inquiry of the Department of Labor are conclusive on the court that reviews on a hearing on a writ of habeas corpus, and the court is powerless, save in the case of abuse of discretion, to review those facts. If we allow the limitation of review in a case where human life is involved, there certainly should be no complaint where we allow it in the case of review of the findings of the Radio Commission. That situation holds true in almost all reviews—save where there are exceptions embodied in the statute—of the findings of fact of administrative heads of all bureaus.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. BARTON. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who, I understand, is a distinguished lawyer, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this simply gives to the findings of the Radio Commission the standing of a verdict of a jury. Questions of fact can be reviewed by the higher court in exactly the same way and to the same extent as findings of a jury could be reviewed. The evidence in the case must be substantial and must support the finding of the commission, else it can be reviewed by the court. Not only that, but the evidence must be so clear and convincing that it indicates that the commission was not arbitrary or capricious. These questions can be investigated by the court; otherwise the finding is conclusive.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. BECK. In the first place, let me say in this instance I am not a distinguished lawyer but only an extinguished one, and therefore I do not want the House to attach any special weight to what I am about to say.

It is undoubtedly true that in the judicial branch of the Government an appellate court is very frequently concluded by findings of fact of a lower court or of a jury, but in this case there is no finding of any lower court or of any jury. It is the finding of an executive tribunal.

I did not come into the House with the idea of objecting to or criticizing this bill, but I was struck by the fact that this is part of a general trend in all governments—I suppose due to the more complicated state of society—to shift the burden of protecting the rights and liberties of the individual from the judicial to the executive branch of the Government. If the executive branch of the Government were both omniscient and infallible, we might expect good results. As a matter of fact there has been the very gravest injustice perpetrated by executive tribunals of the character that is contemplated here. In the very matter of immigration, when I was Solicitor General I knew of cases of such hardship that in one case where the immigration authorities had excluded a poor little Polish girl who was deaf, dumb, and blind, who, if refused landing, would have been thrown back upon her country, where she had no relatives or friends, to die, I went into the Supreme Court and confessed error, because it was one of the most flagrant cases of "man's inhumanity to man," and it was simply the spirit of bureaucratic power that induced the exclusion of this unfortunate little girl.

The trouble is—and I call the attention of the House to it—that the moment you shift from the judicial to the executive tribunal the right to communicate with millions of people, what follows?

The Federal Radio Commission appoints an examiner and the examiner runs through the country and takes pages of testimony, just as the examiner of the Interstate Commerce Commission runs through the country and takes testimony. Then the commission adopts the report of the examiner, and in the last analysis, as was clearly shown in the book to which I referred, namely, Lord Hewart's remarkable book called "The New Despotism," in which he inveighed against just such a tendency in England as we are witnessing here, in the last analysis the rights of American citizens were rested upon the decision of some underpaid clerk, who ran around the country and took testimony.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. Is it not a case where there is no perfect answer to the situation, and we have to accept the lesser of two evils? If we would follow the conclusions reached in the book, which the gentleman mentioned, would we not have a situation where our Federal courts would be piled up with intricate cases so that they could not ever get abreast of their work? For example, if the courts would be permitted on a writ of habeas corpus, to examine into the facts de novo, we would have hundreds and hundreds of writs taken out in the various district courts. Personally I would prefer it, because it might be helpful to me in my own district, but I can see insurmountable difficulties that would crop up in the Federal courts if all of these cases, in the nature of full and complete reviews de novo from decisions of the various branches of our Government, the various heads of bureaus and boards of special inquiry and radio commissions, were to come before the Federal courts. The courts would get nowhere. They could not possibly keep abreast of the multifarious cases that come in and the various and divers questions that would arise in those cases.

Mr. BECK. In reply to that, it is very easy to exaggerate the difficulty of these cases. Here is John Smith, who invests so many hundreds of thousands of dollars or millions of dollars in an elaborate scheme of broadcasting. Suddenly every cent of capital is destroyed by the suspension or revocation of this license. If he had the right to go into court, which could examine not merely questions of law but questions of fact, it could then be determined whether the revocation or suspension of that license was in good faith; because executive tribunals are very human. They may have an improper motive for suspending a man's license, and yet they may assign, as mere camouflage, all sorts of technical difficulties about that particular station, difficulties that never occurred to them when they granted the license; but, having granted the license and being dissatisfied with the licensee's use of it or perhaps desiring to take his wave length and give it to somebody else, the Federal Radio Commission can, as I said before, upon testimony taken by some clerical examiner, destroy his right, without any appeal on his part to the court, except as to questions of law, and those questions of law play but a very insignificant part in such controversy. It is a question of fact whether he is making legitimate use of the wave lengths.

As I was trespassing upon the gentleman's time, I simply read a part of the section in reference to findings of fact being conclusive, but the proviso that the court may consider whether or not the finding of the Radio Commission is capricious or arbitrary practically adds nothing. In the actual administration of the existing law, circuit courts of appeal have simply said: Is there any question of law? If not, the findings of the commission are final and, therefore, that disposes of the controversy when it comes into the court of appeals.

Now, for my part, I quite appreciate what my friend said. This is a part of the trend, as I said before, in many cases, as in the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is dictated by considerations of necessity, and it would be impossible for the judiciary to go into the inquiries, profound and complicated, that are made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In the matter of excluding aliens it may be desirable, but I doubt, from my experience as Solicitor General, whether this arbitrary right on the part of the Immigration Commission on questions of fact ought to be as it undoubtedly is under the law. But let us not extend something that diminishes the prestige of the courts, that robs them of what is a judicial function, and that turns over to a bureau such absolute power over property and property rights, a power exercised too often in the spirit with which the great poet said:

> But man, proud man!
> Drest in a little brief authority,—
> Most ignorant of what he's most assured,
> His glassy essence—like an angry ape,
> Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
> As make angels weep.

[Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not the beautiful little poem the gentleman just recited very applicable to many of our United States district judges?

Mr. BECK. That may be true. But after all the sanctity of the judicial branch of the Government—upon the whole, well deserved in our history—is such that the judge who sits on the bench is not the prosecutor, jury, and judge as these executive commissions are. They initiate a prosecution to suspend a license, we will say, and every impulse of their minds is naturally to sustain that which they have initiated. They are judges in their own cause, and they find facts to suit the particular objects which they have in mind. Then, when a citizen, who thinks he lives in a country of laws and not of men, goes into a court of justice he does not go into the lower court that could examine the facts, but he goes into a court of appeals. There he finds the Congress has closed the door of inquiry upon that element of the controversy which is generally conclusive, namely, facts.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I just wish to say that the determination as to whether a license should be granted, renewed, or canceled is purely a matter of administration and not a judicial question whatsoever. No right of property is involved because no property can vest in the ether under our laws. Now, if you are going to place the administration of the public affairs of this country in the judiciary, we might as well abandon the executive departments.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CLANCY. Right on that point, the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Article V, says that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] is making a very ingenious argument and saying that there is no property in the ether.

Federal advertising restriction on broadcasting is being discussed in the Senate, and may be further discussed in the House, and legislation may result in the destruction of broadcasting property and in the confiscation of the property of the owner or owners of a broadcasting station. The station may be worth several million dollars and may be paying $200,000 a year. Confiscation of property may be involved.

If the owner or manager of a radio station should allow that station to be used for illegal purposes, for instance, for the purpose of broadcasting signals to rumrunners as to when they may run their liquor in, then the license of the station can be revoked by the Federal Radio Commission, and of course there is a confiscation of property and possibly a wreckage of the fortune of the individual. Does the gentleman from New Jersey imply that if the Federal Radio Commission should determine that a license should be revoked, there shall be no appeal to the Supreme Court or to the courts below the Supreme Court?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; not at all. They have that absolute right. We grant, without question, the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, which was a question in doubt before this legislation. They can appeal to the courts against any injustice, but they have got to show that there was injustice. They can not ask the court to set up its opinion on how an administrative matter should be handled as against the board that was created in the executive department for that very purpose; but, certainly, the courts exist, and, certainly, we provide that any injustice that may be done by perversion of the function to administer the law may be corrected by the court.

Mr. CLANCY. But the gentleman from New Jersey states there is no property in the license, and the Constitution refers specifically to protection of property. Therefore the gentleman's argument would not support an appeal to the Supreme Court under Article V, would it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is not a person who makes application for permission to build a station, that makes application for a license to broadcast, but who knows perfectly well it is a naked license and no property rights flow out of the granting of the license. They know this before they start, so, consequently, there can be no hardship if by reason of their own misuse of the license they lose it.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, a number of wholly irrelevant arguments have been injected into the debate which have no application to the bill under consideration. For instance, on the question of confiscation of property and of vested rights, the law provides that no radio licensee shall receive any vested right by reason of such license or the use of the wave lengths or the air, and he should not receive any vested rights thereto.

I do not care how many millions he may spend under the temporary license, as suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey; he knows and has notice under the law that he acquires no right even to use that property except during the period of his license. The license itself fixes the period of use, unless he gets it renewed, and the law specifically provides that he acquires no vested rights, and Congress should never permit them to acquire any vested rights. As to whether they acquire vested rights under the law generally, and as to whether it is a case of confiscation, is a question that has been repeatedly and definitely settled in the negative in decisions on analogous cases. I commend to the reading of the gentleman from Michigan the famous case of Kidd against Pearson, which has been followed in innumerable instances ever since.

The courts have always held that under circumstances of this kind it is in no sense a confiscation of property for the Government or any other instrumentality or branch of government to refuse to grant a renewal license or to grant it in the first instance.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not want the gentleman to misunderstand me. I had an informal understanding with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] that he would discuss this question and I would ask him some questions, and that the matter would be clarified. I understand the laws fairly well, as a member of the committee, but the gentleman knows that these appeals are continually discussed and that the owners of the radio stations are complaining of possible loss of their licenses and entire fortunes through what they call unwise legislation. The gentleman from Tennessee knows that even when the Radio Commission endeavors to switch a station off its own channel onto another channel, that the station quite invariably takes the matter to the courts.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan that they have the right of appeal to court, as I have stated, from any action of the Radio Commission, and, as the gentleman says, they always appeal if they feel aggrieved, and frequently, perhaps, when they are not aggrieved.

On the question of the investment of radio stations I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House to this fact. Even if you want to predicate this great potentiality on a sordid basis, if you want to consider it on a dollar-and-cents basis, remember this: All of the broadcasting stations in America combined only have $28,000,000 invested in their stations and all of their equipment and apparatus, whereas the great listening public of America have $1,000,000,000 invested in receiving sets [applause], and we are endeavoring to represent the American people and to protect their interests and not trying to do something that will give vested rights to a few of these commercial stations. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], a member of the committee.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would make no remarks at this time had we decided to take up this bill as a simple and definite proposition; but I do want to express myself again on the general subject of radio as I have done heretofore.

I regret very much there is not before this committee, having radio matters in charge, some of the real questions that are of great interest to the American people. I am one of those who greatly regret that a monopoly of radio seems to have been recognized and that the Radio Commission now seems to be busying itself and finding plenty to do in trying to carry out the present law and comes to us asking only for simple clarifying amendments.

In this bill lotteries and similar schemes are the only new matters taken up. I hesitate to suggest to you things that are brought to the attention of the American people by radio in advertising articles of little or no value and possibly fraudulent in the value claimed by the promoters of such advertising.

But I want to bring to the attention of this House that the radio should be used for communication services where the telephone and telegraph are not available.

The educational features also seem to be submerged to those interests who are willing to pay large sums of money to advertise their particular products.

Has this great discovery come to a point wholly dependent on advertising for its use to the American people? With this great invention, is it possible that when you are in an out-of-the-way place, when you are traveling where there is no telephone or telegraph, you can not use it for sending and receiving messages?

We well know how that is so. The monopoly got there before the Congress did and has stifled its use in this direction.

The Federal Trade Commission has made a lengthy report, but the monopoly has simply denied all the allegations.

As one member of the committee, I shall continue to insist that messages and communications, which should be the most important use of radio in the United States, be restored to us by this great combination and monopoly.

We are not always interested in what we have to listen to over the radio as furnished by these advertisers. It should be used in matters of much greater importance than the advertising of cigarettes, lipsticks, and various other things of similar nature.

I rise to point out the dangerous trend in the use of radio, although I do not find the great interest on the general subject that there ought to be on the floor of the House. Every year our Radio Commission will come in with recommendations to clarify existing law, rather than to recommend changes in the system, which the American people will soon demand. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to do that which I have rarely done before—speak without particular preparation for what I have to say.

This bill, according to the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAVIS], gives no vested right to a radio station—and admittedly no vested right in the air can be given by law to any station—but I submit to the chairman of the committee that the procedure of the Radio Commission does give vested rights in effect.

Let me illustrate what I mean by it: This is something that I hope to find time, when my committee work on appropriations clears away, to go into more in detail on the floor.

There is a broadcasting station that operates in Baltimore on three nights a week. A station at Hartford, Conn., operates three nights a week, alternating with the Baltimore station. A station operating at Norfolk, Nebr., 1,500 miles away, is required to shut down at sundown in order to permit these two eastern coast stations to operate on a clear channel. The radio engineers assert that there can be no essential conflict between these stations here and the station in Nebraska. There is no essential conflict in fact in the area that they reach.

These eastern stations do not come into our western country. Our people do not listen to them. They could not give them proper reception if they wanted to listen to them. Our station in Nebraska does not come east. The eastern people would not care particularly to listen to our western programs if they could, and it would not reach into this eastern territory. There is an area between the two that neither serves, and as a result both of those stations could operate on that channel at night without any essential hindrance to the service to the public in listening to their programs.

Now, what happens? Last election time when the Norfolk station wanted to broadcast for one night the election returns to Nebraska listeners the Radio Commission told them they had to get permission of the people at Baltimore to broadcast the election returns in Nebraska. The permission was not granted, and accordingly the commission denied the request also. This year the Norfolk station asked permission to operate one hour later.

At the present time they are operating where time changes, and the people who are served in my district must tune out at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. They asked for permission to broadcast at the Norfolk station for one additional hour per day. The Radio Commission did not say "We will consider your case on its merits," but told them "You go and get permission of the people who own the station in Baltimore and permission of the people who own the station in Hartford, Conn., and if they will grant you permission, then we will grant you permission."

I submit that that is the actual granting and giving of a vested right in broadcasting, and in channels and station privileges that the law does not contemplate should be given and which the law prohibits. I submit to the chairman of this committee that there must be radical revision, either of the commission's practices in that regard or in the law, in order that the services and facilities of the radio may be given to the people to a much greater extent than they are now given.

Under what is known as the Davis amendment, power was allocated to the States based on population. That power, based on population, gives to the city of Chicago far more broadcasting facilities than to all the rest of the people in all of that zone in which we are located. They refused to grant a license to a little 100-watt station in western Nebraska. Some of you know that my congressional district is larger than the State of Indiana by 7,000 square miles, and is as large as the State of Illinois. We are denied the right to have a little broadcasting station in western Nebraska, not on the ground that it will interfere with any existing station in the United States but because under the Davis amendment Nebraska is a little over its quota.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the largest watt power station in the gentleman's district?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I could not say.

Mr. BLANTON. About how many watts?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not say definitely.

Those two things should be taken up and worked out by the committee to the end that the radio may more completely serve the American people and to the end that the chain-controlled stations may not monopolize the air as they are now permitted to do. Independent radio stations are absolutely essential.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity for speaking on the administrative measures of the bill itself, but I believe that every time the question of property right or vested interest in the air is mentioned on the floor of this House it ought to be immediately opposed, denied, and emphatically reiterated that every broadcasting station in the country is operating under a revocable license and nothing else, and that not even use of years and years will create a vested right within the meaning of the law to operate.

Congress has done nothing to give any such right or color of right, and Congress never has and will not, I am sure, say anything on the floor that would even remotely indicate that the user of these licenses creates an interest in the ether or right to operate, regardless of the amount of the investment in the machinery of the broadcasting station.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. If as a factor the effect of the regulations and action of the Radio Commission are such that they recognize a vested right, then have they not given it, although Congress has denied it? That is actually what has happened, so that a few chain stations absolutely control broadcasting in the United States, and under the regulations and decisions and actions of the Radio Commission; while by law they have no vested right, in fact they have.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The commission has no such power and can not establish such a right. It can not convey that which it has not. The clear intent of the law is—and it was repeated over and over again in the early debates on all radio legislation—that the license to operate a radio station was only a temporary permit; that there was nothing permanent in a license or permit; that it was simply license, and I contend that nothing that the commission can do, either by act or decision or otherwise, can create a vested right.

As has been pointed out on the floor of the House to-day, the primary interest of Congress in radio legislation is protection of the public, not of the privileged licensees who are in it for commercial purposes. Whether it is telephone or cable or telegraph companies, they are subject to regulation, State or otherwise, and they use their own property for the transmission of communications. Here a broadcasting station and the use of radio are absolutely dependent upon the use of the ether, which gives all the more right to the public in putting the strictures which we do upon them, and absolutely limiting this use to a mere revocable license and nothing else.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman referred to the intent that there should be no vested right. Is it not a fact that the law expressly goes farther and emphatically declares, positively declares, that there shall be no vested right?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is correct. If the gentleman will recall the early discussions of radio legislation, it would have been impossible to pass any sort of a bill in this House had that specific provision not been written into the bill.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Is it not true that the principle is well settled and founded that no adverse use as against the public or public right ever can be matured or vested, no matter what the length of time, and that the public always can reclaim and regain its rights, no matter how long they have been adversely used by another?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and regardless of how much their investment may be.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, in reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan on pending legislation on advertisements, I will say that is in the hands of the people who abuse the privilege granted to them by Congress, and it is not in our hands. If these broadcasting stations persist in abusing their licenses in such ways as to make their broadcasting nauseating, by repeated advertisement and advertising talks which could not be used in the same manner in the papers, then if there is legislation, it will be their fault and not the fault of Congress. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] probably stepped out of the Chamber after I had my colloquy with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], and the gentleman did not hear my colloquy with the gentleman from Tennessee, the very able chairman of the committee [Mr. DAVIS]. Otherwise the gentleman from New York would withhold his remarks. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] endeavors to advise me about bringing up this property and vested rights question, whereas the gentleman from New York has been known as one of the chief exponents on this floor of the question of free speech.

As a member of the Radio Committee, I have been asked time and time again by the owners of radio stations as to just what property or vested rights they had in their costly equipment and in their license. Certainly this discussion initiated by me to-day, which will be read by every radio broadcasting owner in the country, will help clarify the situation. What do the radio broadcasters take up in their annual national conventions? They take up primarily and devote most of their time to the question of what property rights they have and whether their property is secure or not. They complain emphatically about their being restricted to 90-day licenses and about their insecurity.

The gentleman from New York did not go so far as to say that station owners hold their licenses only for 90 days and how they resecure their title and tenure in their property simply by renewals every three months. I do not want to be "advised" for mentioning the fact that there is a bill in the Senate to regulate radio advertising on the air. There is plenty of discussion in the newspapers and magazines about that proposal, and there is much discussion in the Senate, so why can we not consider it here on the floor of the House? To-day is the free-for-all radio day, the first we have had this session; and it may be the last day this session on which we can discuss radio, so why should we not be allowed to go ahead?

I said to the gentleman from Tennessee when he began to speak on this subject that I had an informal understanding with Mr. LEHLBACH, the minority leader on the committee, that I would ask him certain questions on the matter of property and vested rights, and he would respond, and we would get it in the RECORD, and the harassed owners of radio stations would at least get the reasonings, motives, and philosophy of the majority of the committee on radio "property" or "vested" rights.

Surely I am performing a useful public service in clarifying the matter.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to talk on this matter, but it is a matter that concerns particularly the district I represent in the State of Washington. We have there the foundation and the beginning of the second chain of National Broadcasting Corporation. It has gradually and almost completely taken possession of the air in the Northwest on the Pacific coast.

I take it that the bill under consideration to-day is intended to clarify a legal situation. The bill does not provide for an appeal with safeguard pending appeal.

It is my fortune or misfortune to have been the receiver of the Northwest Broadcasting Corporation when it became bankrupt. I want to tell you the experience we had with this Radio Commission, a commission which you have created, a commission with autocratic powers. I want to give you our experience in that matter. The Northwest Broadcasting Co., as I say, became bankrupt and the court appointed me receiver to take charge of that organization. Immediately word came from the commission to close down our station and to get off the air. One-third of a million dollars was there to be cast into the heap. It was not owned by one particular individual but by many stockholders. Were it not for the fact that I myself, as receiver, was not conversant with the provisions of the law which made it a penalty to disregard the order of the commission, I would have obeyed the order of the commission; but not being conversant I wired them back that I could not and would not take the station off the air, and I did not. To-day that organization is a thriving institution on the Pacific coast.

You gentlemen do not realize what you have created. You have created a commission which plays up to you if you have the influence, if you have the power back of you. If any of you desire to secure a wave length, take plenty of us on this side of the Chamber and plenty on the other side of the Chamber, and then you will get your wave length. They talk about it not being a vested interest. Of course it is not. But, as a matter of fact, as the gentleman from Nebraska said, it is a vested interest. The three monopolies that to-day are virtually controlling the air have it down to the point where they will tell you whether you can or you can not have your little station established in your locality. They have usurped the power of the commission. While that is not recognized, as the gentleman from Nebraska said, it is there, and you have to obey.

I have heard statements made about the investments made by the American people in these organizations. I suppose that is for the purpose of playing up to the public, that it is a vote-getting statement, and I may learn more about it after I have been here for some time. However, I want to say to you that these independent organizations should be protected. If I had the time, I could mention many cases, but I will mention only one. It is a matter of record that when radio was under the Department of Commerce a little man up in one of the States—I think it was in Wisconsin or Michigan—was approached one day as to the sale of his station. He told them it was not for sale. They told him he had better sell, and you will find it of record that after he had lost his nerve and when he thought he was about to lose his station, he asked the Department of Commerce what their attitude was, and they said, "You had better sell." What happened? He lost his station, and to-day his case is on appeal. Do not tell me that the commission is above influence. Now, between the time of his appeal and the time of the decision of the court of appeals the owner can not operate his station, and it is closed down. I am of the opinion that this law should be amended so that there will be some provision in it providing that between the time when a man goes to the court and the time he gets a definite decision he will be permitted to operate. But as it is now, a station can be taken off the air, and it is taken off the air. This virtually destroys the station and amounts to almost confiscation, such is the arbitrary power of the commission.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, the language used by our distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] is probably so rhetorical and so embellished with finely polished periods that we are likely to mistake the shadow for the substance.

I believe that when it comes to the interpretation of the rights of broadcasting stations, as appears on page 14, that the only question we must determine is this: Are the rights of these broadcasters substantially protected? I believe the language which gives them the right to appeal to the court to determine whether substantial justice has been done is sufficient for their purposes and that they are amply protected. There is no need for any amendments to the bill offered by the Committee on the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, presided over by our esteemed colleague from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The hearing they have before the Radio Commission, I might say for the edification of my distinguished colleague from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY], is due process under the Constitution beyond peradventure of a doubt. If you should permit the language to be changed in this or any similar statute to the effect that the appellate courts would have the right de novo to hear all the witnesses and to go into all the ramification of facts, you would have the district courts so lumbered up and so glutted with cases that you could not get any case tried for several years to come.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. In just a moment when I have finished with my thought.

There is not a week passes that we who are members of the Judiciary Committee of the House are not importuned and asked to increase the number of district judges throughout the country; and I say that if you change this statute along the lines suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania—and you would have to change all other similar statutes in justice to those involved under such statutes—we would be compelled to come into this House and ask you to allow us to pass a bill doubling the number of Federal judges. Will you do that? You emphatically will not do that.

For example, often a patent case or a case of using the mail to defraud takes weeks and weeks and takes the energy and services and time of several judges. A radio case takes weeks sometimes before it is concluded in the Radio Commission, and you will have then much, too much work piled on the district judges if you provide that the court can on appeal consider the radio case anew and hear witnesses de novo or even pass upon questions of fact anew and not be bound by the commission's findings in any respect. You just can not do it, gentlemen. You are up against a situation where you must be practical. You can not be impractical idealists on this proposition. You must be expedient, even at the expense of a little injustice at times.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. HORR. As a matter of fact, all these cases are heard by about seven commissioners; is not that true?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. HORR. So it would not take any more to give them de novo with seven additional judges.

Mr. CELLER. It would. I am not only referring to this particular radio statute. If you are going to have these cases considered anew in the Federal courts when they refer to radio, you have got to do the same thing when the case refers to immigration, or when it refers to a fraud-order case in the Postmaster General's department. You will have to go all along down the line, and then you will have the Federal courts so filled up with such cases that if you have a meritorious case you could not get your case tried for years unless you would allow us to come in and double the number of judges we have at the present time, and in the interest of economy you would not do that.

Mr. HORR. As a matter of fact, in immigration cases we are doing that right now; is not that true?

Mr. CELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. HORR. They are entitled to do just that.

Mr. CELLER. In the immigration cases you can not, for example, go behind the findings of fact of the board of special inquiry. Their findings of fact are conclusive unless the court finds there is abuse of discretion, or action the result of caprice and unreason.

Mr. HORR. You can sue out a writ of habeas corpus and go right into the matter.

Mr. CELLER. I beg to differ with the gentleman. The gentleman is entirely wrong. On a writ of habeas corpus you can not go beyond the findings of fact made by the board of special inquiry unless discretion is abused. That is conclusive upon the court. You can only do that in case of an abuse of discretion and arbitrary action.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subparagraph (f) of section 1 of the radio act of 1927 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 47, sec. 81) is amended by inserting after the words "within the" words "jurisdiction of the," so that as amended said subparagraph shall read: "or (f) upon any aircraft or other mobile stations within the jurisdiction of the United States, except under and in accordance with this act and with a license in that behalf granted under the provisions of this act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised that since the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] has emancipated himself from a bureaucratic administration, and notwithstanding the fact that he still belongs to a bureaucratic party, he should nevertheless now array himself against the autocracy of bureaucrats. It is encouraging, however, that he has taken this stand.

The great trouble with the hearings by the Federal Radio Commission is that they are before ignorant, inexperienced, incompetent, inefficient examiners, and the examiner passes on what testimony he shall admit in the record and upon that which he shall exclude. He keeps out all evidence he does not want to go in, and the record which finally reaches the commissioners is a biased, prejudiced, incorrect, incomplete, warped record that is both unfair and unjust.

If the Federal Radio Commission would get high-class men, efficient and able, with legal experience, to act as examiners, we would not have a bit of trouble. They should be just as efficient and reliable as the master in court appointed to hear the evidence for the judge. This is where the trouble is. For instance, a complaint is made against the radio station in Nebraska or in Michigan or in Texas, and the complaint may not have a bit of merit at all. It may be inspired by some one who wants Naboth's vineyard, as our friend says, and frequently it is just that kind of a case. There is no other reason for the complaint, no merit whatever in it, and this little station is forced to come to Washington and bring its witnesses here, sometimes at a cost of $100 or $150 per witness, to appear before some little examiner, and then the examiner will rule out half of their pertinent evidence, of strong probative force and effect.

And when the record gets to the commissioners to pass upon it is not the real record, but the inspired, warped record of those who brought the complaint. If the examiner's report is against the station, in nine cases out of ten, unless that little station appears in Washington before the commission and personally represents that station, in nine cases out of ten the examiner's report will be upheld by the commission, and in order to get its rights the station will have to go into an expensive appeal to the courts, which can not grant relief on a warped record.

I have in mind a small station in Texas, a station that had only 100 watts at night and 250 watts in the daytime, struggling to exist. Some one wanted the station. They caused complaint after complaint to be made against the station, all without merit. They inspired representatives of the Radio Division of the Department of Commerce to make three different trips from New Orleans over to central Texas and filed these complaints with the Federal Radio Commission.

That little station was forced to come to Washington three different times at great expense and bring witnesses here, and when it properly presented their case the commission did uphold their rights and did renew their license. But it required a hard fight.

You can depend on the Federal Radio Commission to do right and justice if it knows all the facts, but it takes money and it takes time and it takes representation to get the rights of the ordinary little station before the commission.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BECK. Is it not a fact that if the judicial power of the Government is not stripped of its power, the little station to which the gentleman refers could have gone into the United States district court in Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has been a great Solicitor General, and knows that most of the courts on these matters appoint a master to hear the evidence, who is exactly in the same situation as an examiner. The master hears the evidence and makes a report to the court, and on that record the court makes its decision. So after all it is necessary to have fair, able examiners.

My point is that we ought to require the Federal Radio Commission to appoint only masters of high character and legal ability to pass on these questions—to hear the evidence and to present the commission a fair and impartial record upon which the rights of the various stations may be adjudicated.

When the Federal Radio Commission does that and has a fair record before it, I have confidence in it, and I believe it will do right and justice to every individual station in the United States, but it must have proper examiners and fair, just records.

Now, there is one other matter that I want to allude to. There must be a more equitable distribution of stations in the United States. My friend THOMASON, from El Paso, has a good station, because he is on the border. My good friend LANHAM has several at Fort Worth, because it is a big city. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has several stations at the big city of Dallas, and there are several at San Antonio and I am glad these fine cities have them, but there are other districts in Texas, and there will be in the next House 16 other districts, where smaller local stations ought to be located, as they are entitled to an equitable distribution of radio service.

Mr. CELLER. Does not the gentleman think that under this bill he will get the benefit of these stations in the large cities?

Mr. BLANTON. We listen in on WEAF and other stations in New York when we want to, but when we get tired of listening to New York we ought to have the inherent privilege as American citizens to listen in for local matters on our own station once in a while. Sometimes the programs in New York do not suit us exactly, and sometimes the programs in Chicago do not suit us exactly, and we may want something besides advertising programs, and we are entitled to listen in to our own stations whenever we want to.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. These high-grade men that the gentleman wants will cost money.

Mr. BLANTON. Pay the examiners the money. The man who takes the testimony and makes the record ought to get good money.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. BLANTON. But I want high-class men to take the evidence and to make the record upon which the rights of my constituents are to be adjudicated.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. How would the gentleman divide the district of Texas as to the location of stations?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, every congressional district is entitled to at least a small local station. I would say that every district in Nebraska is entitled to a small local station. I would say that the Federal Radio Commission ought to pass upon whether or not the district in Nebraska shall have service, and not require the stations to get a permit from Baltimore or Hartford.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two additional minutes in order to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend from New York that an application from the little station out in Norfolk, Nebr., ought to be determined by the Federal Radio Commission, and not by a station in Baltimore and not by a station in Hartford on the New England coast.

Mr. CELLER. Each zone has its equal facilities, has it not?

Mr. BLANTON. No. Now, I promised to yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CELLER. As these stations close in one zone, they go to a zone that is not sufficiently supplied.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] said that his station was notified they would have to get permission from Baltimore before they could operate a little 100-watt station.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. In advocating greater distribution of stations does the gentleman take into consideration the fact that the emission from a station interferes vastly farther than the station itself carries? In other words, that the station will interfere a great deal farther than the station can actually be heard.

Mr. BLANTON. How can a little 100-watt station in Nebraska interfere with Baltimore?

Mr. BLAND. Well, I do not know that it can.

Mr. BLANTON. It can not. But whenever the people of Nebraska have to come to a private operating station in Baltimore to get their rights under the American law it is going a little too far. I rebel against it.

Mr. BLAND. But the gentleman was speaking about distribution, and I wondered if the gentleman had taken that into consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. I think every district in the United States ought to have a small station for local matters. They have a right to it, and I am going to fight on this floor until they get it. Every district in the United States is entitled to at least a small station, and if they are country people they are entitled to rights just the same as city people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The question of allocation of stations and wave lengths and power is a very difficult one and can not be decided in an offhand way. Probably there may be some cases of injustice, but there is no perfect answer to it. I believe the members of the Federal Radio Commission are doing their best to bring about suitable and equitable and proper allocation of all radio facilities. I hold no brief for any large station. Some of the large stations are in New York, such as WJZ, WEAF, WOR, and so on. They probably have been guilty of offenses. I repeat, I hold no brief for them. The radio chains—the red chain or the blue chain—are somewhat united in this sense: That the Radio Corporation of America, which probably, directly or indirectly, controls the National Broadcasting Co., with its station WEAF and other large and powerful stations, has a monopoly on all radio machinery, and thus the Radio Corporation of America very likely controls the whole radio situation in this country; but we must give the devil his due. We must give credit where credit is due. Do you know, gentlemen, that we would be deprived of the finest programs, programs that even reach the district of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], programs from Europe, if you strike too severe a blow at the great stations. We must, for example, compliment the National Broadcasting Co. for their broadcasts, for example, of operas from the Metropolitan Opera House. I would advise the gentleman to tune in on these chain stations and listen on Saturday afternoons to the finest programs he could possibly ever hear, emanating from the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. The gentleman will hear the finest singers ever collected under any one roof. He will hear Maria Jeritza, Rosa Ponselle, Lily Pons, Lucrezia Bori, Gigli, Lauri-Volpi, and others, who comprise the finest singing aggregation in the world. If we did not give some greater facilities than are given to other stations to stations like WEAF and WJZ we would be deprived, for example, of hearing the deliberations at the Geneva Disarmament Conference. We could not get programs from Europe given by Frederic William Wile and William Hard, distinguished newspaper men, all the way from Geneva. We have heard Ramsay MacDonald over the radio. We have heard Mussolini. He have heard His Holiness the Pope. We could not hear those broadcasts if we did not give some sort of advantage to those larger stations. I may say to some of those who complain about these stations—and I have complained against them at times also—we must nevertheless give them their due. We must remember that it costs money to operate those stations, and it is essential to get advertising to pay for those broadcasts. If we place too many limitations upon the type and manner of those broadcasts we will get into a situation very much like that which obtains in Europe, where the owners of the radio sets will be compelled to pay a license in order to defray expenses of broadcasting. I would not want to see this country get into a position where, in order to defray the expenses of radio broadcasting, the owners of radio sets would be compelled to pay a license.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not delude himself that under the present monopoly of patent rights the people are paying a very handsome royalty on their sets?

Mr. CELLER. I said at the inception of my remarks that there is a virtual monopoly. The situation is very difficult, and you must let the difficulty work out in time. It takes a long time to solve these problems, and you must lodge the responsibility somewhere. I believe we are on the right track. The situation to-day is far better, I will say for the edification of the gentleman from New York, than it was in 1924. We came into this House then and passed the act of 1924 giving power to the Radio Commission, a power which was lodged prior thereto in the Department of Commerce. The situation has grown considerably better, and it will grow better from time to time. We must be patient. We must and can very well trust the Radio Commission.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I listened a moment ago to the complaint regarding the necessity of new radio stations for every district in the State of Texas, or in other States, and I desire to amplify the suggestions made by the former speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]. There are technical difficulties that present themselves in the allocation of these proposed new stations. As a matter of fact, although there has been a tremendous advance in radio, in radio development in general, and in the type of receiving sets we have to-day in particular, compared with those we used 10 or 12 years ago, there has been no increase in the number of wave lengths. We have practically the same number of wave lengths we had 12 years ago. There are about 89 wave lengths. The average radio-dial range is from 540 to 1,500 kilocycles. That means that there are 960 kilocycles in the range of the dial. The most selective receiving set made is the superheterodyne. That instrument will give us clear reception and will separate stations with 10 kilocycles clearance. That will make room on your dial for 96 stations, which under ordinary circumstances could be heard very clearly. But we have over 600 radio stations in the country, all broadcasting programs of more or less importance. Let us consider for a moment how this is accomplished. It is accomplished by the exchange of time, two stations or three stations dividing the time. It is accomplished, in a sense, by geography, and by that I mean geographical location. A station in Oregon and a station in Beverly, Mass., or one in Rhode Island and one in Arizona, broadcasting on the same wave lengths at the same time but separated by sufficient distance so as to cause no harmful interference, may be on the air at the same time. The other element that enters into it is the amount of power that is used, the idea being that a 100-watt station will not interfere seriously with a 2,500-watt station, provided they are not on the same wave length. You can have two powerful stations using 50,000 watts and you can have them located only a few miles apart, and they will not interfere with each other provided they use widely separated wave lengths. If one is working on 460 meters or a corresponding number of kilocycles and the other is working on 235 meters, you can hear both stations perfectly distinctly. Then again, the strong station will not blanket the weak station if there is a sufficient separation between the wave lengths. These are some of the difficulties that present themselves, and until radio science develops a closer degree of separation than 10 kilocycles the problem will not be solved.

I presume these provisions are laid down very clearly in the regulations made by the Radio Commission. Now, as you go over your dial there are only a few stations that you can hear clearly, and they are very largely the chain stations which belong to the great radio corporation, the National Broadcasting Co., Columbia Broadcasting Co., or the ramifications of these institutions wherever they exist, principally, of course, in the large cities. They are located there because in the large cities you are able to secure talent. You have these large stations in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, and other large cities in order to provide the talent for the type of entertainment that is considered necessary to make the radio programs interesting to the public.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not a fact that all of these cowboy crooners come from Texas or somewhere down there?

Mr. CROWTHER. And the crooners are the abomination of radio.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for two minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Was the gentleman serious in his statement that all the talent in the country is to be found in the large cities?

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, no; I did not say that. I said that, obviously, at these stations in the large cities splendid talent is immediately available. You can not immediately transport your talent from the country town a thousand miles away to the radio station. I am not discussing the origin of talent. Genius and talent have no especial habitat, and we know that all our great men like the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] come from small towns in the country [laughter and applause], and they frequently allude to that fact in their congressional biographies and in their campaign messages to their constituents. In days gone by candidates advertised that they were of humble origin, that they had driven mules on the canal towpath, that they had been plainsmen, or had started in life as newsboys, but in the days to come they will indicate their humble lineage by saying to their audiences, "My friends, I come from a 1-car family. We only had one automobile." [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I will be glad to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. And the distinguished gentleman from New York is also from a small town, is he not?

Mr. CROWTHER. Well, I come from one of the largest and one of the best towns in the world, and it has the best radio station in the world—WGY, Schenectady, N. Y. Schenectady is the name of a thriving town of nearly 100,000 people. The gentleman from Oklahoma has not many more inhabitants than that in some of his counties, while we have that many folks in our city. People who desire to come to see us sometimes wire us to meet them at Albany, because they have difficulty in spelling Schenectady. Some people wonder whether it is the name of an Indian chief or a patent medicine. It is an Indian word and means the "end of the trail." It is the name of one of the most progressive cities in the country, and one of the most up-to-date communities, with the finest radio station there is in the United States—and possibly in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I firmly believe that in considering radio we are considering something far more vital than entertainment. I believe we are considering something that strikes at the very roots of government itself, and I am going to tell you why. In this modern age there is no freedom of speech worthy of the name unless there is reasonable freedom of access to radio. The right and privilege to stand on the street corner and talk no longer fills the bill. With the coming of radio we have virtually seen air of this country monopolized and turned over to the large stations, such as the one that my friend from New York has just described; but, my friends, that wonderful station, which the gentleman has spoken of and which belongs to General Electric, will never use its facilities to appeal for the rights of the people of this country. The facilities of that station will be used to spread propaganda to lull the people to sleep while monopoly or concentrated greed takes unfair advantage of the country. The hope of freedom of speech is going to rest back in the little, free, independent radio stations in the country.

Thomas Jefferson did not have it far wrong. When he read the Constitution he was not particularly satisfied with it, but he said that it did not make much difference what kind of a charter of government we had so long as we had a free and untrammeled press. In this day of radio, to make that statement practical and to bring it down to date, it might well be added that it does not make much difference what kind of a charter of government we have so long as we have a free and untrammeled radio.

Now, what are the facts? We have set aside the clear channels for large stations, and when we have done that, for all intents and purposes, we have given it over to monopoly, because of the great amount of money it takes to operate a large station. I am like the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]—we should better be thinking about the little 100-watt station and not worrying about the large station.

Let me ask you this question. Here are these stations all chained on the dial carrying the same program. What service is to be gained or what does the public gain, if you please, by being able to turn to a half dozen places on the dial and hear "Amos 'n' Andy"?

The truth is, if we are going to have chain radio and chain up the radio of this country, they should all be placed on about the same wave length, instead of giving away the wave lengths of this country to a few large stations.

A 10,000-watt station in Chicago can have its power increased to 50,000 watts, and under the rules and regulations of the Radio Commission the power of the State of Illinois has not been increased; but if a little 100-watt station out in Kansas or in Texas wants to be increased to 250 watts, it is told that the State or zone quota has already been filled; in other words, adding 100 or 250 watts to a little station affects the quota, but jumping a 10,000-watt station to 50,000 watts does not affect it.

Let me give you another illustration. In Chicago this last summer WENR and some other station, I think it is WLS, were allowed to use the same transmitter. One is a 50,000-watt station. This meant 24 hours of time on the one transmitter, and by this means—you can take it either way you want—one station either had its facilities increased from 12 hours to 24 hours or the other had its facilities increased from 10,000 watts to 50,000 watts. The big stations have been getting the best of this thing and have been hogging the air, which is more than an injustice to the independent station. It is an injustice to the American people themselves, and it is destructive of freedom and of human liberty, because there is no human liberty where there is no freedom of speech and access to freedom of speech.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Under the radio act, clearly and unmistakably there is supposed to be no censorship, but for all intents and purposes it is censorship. In taking stations off the air they are not taken off in the old-fashioned American way. Under the rules a man who has invested $200,000 in a station has no vested rights. Maybe not. But he does have the right to a fair hearing in the old-fashioned American way, the old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon way, if you please.

He must leave his home State, leave behind the United States district court of his State, and come to Washington for his hearing before a commission; and then, after that commission renders its decision his sole right of appeal is to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. I say that is not American jurisprudence, it is not Anglo-Saxon; it is the same kind of tyranny that was practiced in the thirteen Colonies when our fathers rebelled against being dragged across the sea to London for a hearing.

Tell me by what process of reasoning the appeal should not be from the Radio Commission back to the district court of your State and my State. That is liberty, that is freedom, that is justice.

Why should that right be any different from anything else? One appeals from the Interstate Commerce Commission back to the local court. And why should it be any different because it is a Radio Commission?

My friends, in conclusion, I want to state this: Out in Kansas Doctor Brinkley had a radio station, and he had to come to the Radio Commission and his license was taken away. He appealed to the circuit court here in the District of Columbia. The people of Kansas resented that because they felt that a citizen of Kansas has the right and privilege to appeal to a Kansas court, and he was denied that right. He was dragged here to Washington, just as our forbears were dragged across the sea to London.

And what happened? The people of Kansas, in their resentment, wrote upon their ballots 185,000 votes for Brinkley for governor—not Brinkley the broadcaster but Brinkley the citizen—because they felt that he had not had a fair trial by his peers, or by a court in his own State of Kansas. The resentment is still there.

It is wrong, and there is no justification for us to take the position in Congress that this power shall be vested in the courts of the District of Columbia instead of the United States court of our own State.

I insist that our radio rights should be adjudicated in the courts of our own State instead of in the District of Columbia. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. It would not be so bad if the hearing were held before the commission because they are composed of high-class gentlemen. But a hearing is granted before some little ignorant inefficient examiner who does not know the law and who does not present a fair record.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute in order to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not care how able the members of the commission may be. I do not care what commission it may be. I believe it is contrary to true liberty and true justice to leave the final decree in the hands of any bureau. I want final consideration vested in an appellate court consisting of the United States court in our own States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last paragraph.

It is hard for a layman to say whether he would like to support this bill in its entirety or not. Without regard to the technical details, there is one exceedingly good paragraph, and that is the last paragraph, which brings all radio programs under a control somewhat similar to the Federal laws, which forbid the advertising of lotteries and the announcement of prize winners, and so forth, through use of the United States mails. The newspapers can not make those announcements of lottery results and go into the mails. But certain radio concerns, as we all know, have been promoting such unlawful schemes, to the financial profit of a large number of frauds and dead beats, who call themselves wizards, soothsayers, mind readers, and miracle performers. They talk over many of the various radios in various parts of the country 15 minutes or 30 minutes a day, read characters, discuss certain human characteristics, and then notify the gullible people to come to the offices of these wizards, where the people are hoodwinked into paying from $1 to $5 for readings, talks, and the like. I am glad that paragraph is in the bill. I have felt that the Radio Commission had power to stop these practices without additional law.

However, I rose to inquire if the fifth zone is being enlarged? My impression is that that zone, in which lies the State of Washington, has been too large, which is the cause of many of our troubles. There seems to be not enough to go around.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. There is absolutely no change of any State at all. California is and always has been in the fifth zone.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is, the fifth zone is all Intermountain and Pacific Coast States? Am I right?

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the gentleman in that connection that the fifth zone is favored more than any other zone in the country, if there is any distinction, because the fifth zone only has about one-third the population of each of the other zones.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is our whole trouble—very large area with limited population.

Mr. DAVIS. But because of the larger geographical area that zone was given the same broadcasting facilities as each of the other four zones. But there is no change in this bill with reference to any State. We do eliminate from the zone provision our Territorial and island possessions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I realize that, and we are glad that the outlying possessions are to be taken from the Pacific coast area.

Mr. DAVIS. That aids that zone to that extent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. I admire the ability of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I know him to be one of the hardest workers in this House. The Members probably do not realize in the Intermountain and Pacific Coast States we have nearly one-half the entire area of continental United States. Comparatively, it is a new country. We have not yet filled it with people. We are met with the fact all the time that that whole area—11 States—has 10 less Members in the House of Representatives than the State of Pennsylvania. Our problems are new problems, and they keep us much more busy than we might be. But I would like to say we have had trouble in one of the large cities, particularly in the largest city in my district—that is to say, southwestern Washington—where we have been unable to get into a radio system with any full-time high-power system. I understand that at last we have received a favorable recommendation from the examiners.

It has been a long, hard fight. The southwestern Washington people, regardless of this or that other radio service, have applied for heavier service, and we are at once met by the system that has been described here, namely, a hearing before an examiner here in Washington, D. C. The hearings have been voluminous. I appeared before an examiner and attempted to testify, and, lo and behold, I had to qualify as an expert as to what I knew about radio, what I knew about frequency, what I knew about service, and what I knew about this and that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I could not qualify as an out-and-out expert. My knowledge of the situation was rather general. I finally was able to state that the southwestern part of the State of Washington has not been receiving anything near what could be called a fair distribution of the radio service. Attorneys for the big services were much in evidence. I am inclined to think that sooner or later, unless the power gets away from us, we will have to break in on this great, big, high-powered hook-up service in the interest of minor service. The power of the press is important. Does not every Member who hears my voice know that it is becoming harder and harder for the small weekly paper to even exist? The large city daily papers are run out on busses and reach the country towns, and the little country weekly paper and small daily which have not been influenced by corporate influence or otherwise are finding it more and more difficult to exist. News and influence from the big radio services will still further weaken the small newspaper.

This is a companion problem, and before we see the breakdown of the smaller papers we will have to break the power of the big radio organization.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I do this in order to interrogate the distinguished chairman of the committee.

About a year ago the brilliant ex-Senator from Missouri, James A. Reed, was broadcasting over a nation-wide hook-up from Sedalia, Mo. In the course of his remarks, when in his characteristic and convincing manner he was vigorously impeaching the national Republican administration and its policies, he was shut off by a distress signal and thousands of his auditors deprived of the privilege of listening to his superb address. Evidently this interference was by some little, shriveled partisan pigmy with a soul so small that in eternity it would require a million years for it to fly over the point of a needle. I am asking the gentleman from Tennessee if under the law and regulations any way has been provided for preventing interferences of this character and for punishing a station that permits itself to be used for this disreputable purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I know of the incident to which he refers, and I denounced it on the floor of this House not long thereafter. There is authority in the law to regulate the operation of every radio licensee and to punish all violations. Furthermore, the radio law specifically provides that it shall be the duty of the licensing authority to suspend the license of any radio operator who has willfully or maliciously interefered with any other radio communication. An investigation was conducted by the Radio Commission, so they advised, with respect to this matter, and it was reported that the distress signals were sent out by an insignificant operator conducting a ship-to-shore station who claimed he thought there was occasion for sending out the distress signal. Of course, any willful or malicious conduct of that kind ought to be prevented so far as possible, and severely punished when it occurs. There was so much criticism of this incident from one end of the country to the other that I trust it will prevent a repetition of it.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. Paragraph (f) of section 4 of the radio act of 1927 (U. S. C., Supp. V., title 47, sec. 84) is amended by striking out the words "in the character of emitted signals," and inserting after the word "unless" in the sixth line thereof the words "after a hearing," so that as amended the proviso will read as follows: "Provided, however, That changes in the wave lengths, authorized power, or in the times of operation of any station shall not be made without the consent of the station licensee unless, after a public hearing, the commission shall determine that such changes will promote public convenience or interest or will serve public necessity or the provisions of this act will be more fully complied with."

Paragraph (k) of said section is amended by striking out the first sentence and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and the ends of justice. The commission may hold public hearings and order testimony to be taken by depositions, at any designated place, in connection with any proceeding or investigation authorized by this act, and may require the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, from any place in the United States, at any designated place of hearing. Any member of the commission, or any examiner or other officer or employee thereof, when duly designated by the commission for such purpose, may hold hearings, sign and issue subpœnas, administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence at any place within the jurisdiction of the United States designated by the commission. In case of failure to comply with any subpœna or in case of the contumacy of any witness appearing at any hearing before the commission, a commissioner thereof, or before an examiner or other officer or employee thereof, the commission may invoke the aid of any district court of the United States. Such a court may thereupon order the witness to comply with the requirements of the subpœna or to give evidence which is relevant to the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by the court as a contempt thereof.

"A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceedings in which he has a pecuniary interest. The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of the proceedings before it, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party to any proceeding may appear before the commission or any commissioner thereof or before an examiner or other officer or employee of the commission holding any hearing and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission, or of any commissioner thereof, or of any examiner or other official or employee thereof, in any hearing, proceeding, or investigation, shall be entered of record, and such record shall be public upon the request of any party interested.

"The commission may order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending under this act at any stage of such proceeding or investigation. Such depositions may be taken before any person designated by the commission and having power to administer oaths. Such testimony shall be reduced to writing by the person taking the deposition, or under his direction, and shall then be subscribed by the deponent. Any person may be compelled to appear and depose and to produce documentary evidence in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify and produce documentary evidence before the commission, or any commissioner thereof, or any examiner, official, or employee thereof, as hereinbefore provided.

"Witnesses summoned as hereinbefore authorized shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States. Witnesses shall be paid by the party at whose instance they are called.

"No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or answering any lawful inquiry or from deposing or from producing documentary evidence before the commission, or any commissioner, examiner, or other officer or employee thereof, or in obedience to the subpœna of the commission, whether such subpœna is signed or issued by one or more commissioners, or by any other person duly authorized, or in any cause or proceeding, criminal or otherwise, based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of this act or upon the taking of any deposition herein provided for, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no natural person shall be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled under oath so to testify, answer, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise: Provided, That no natural person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: On page 4, line 9, after the word "hearing," insert "Provided, That in any hearing in which only one radio station is involved the commission shall, upon the application of such station, hold all of such hearings by an examiner or commissioner at the town or city in which the station is located."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is this. There are two different kinds of hearings that can come up. One is where one station is applying for another station's facility or where there is a controversy between two or three stations. Such a hearing, I think, should be held in Washington, on neutral ground. Then there is another kind of hearing, when no other station is involved, except the station under investigation for the violation of the commission's rules and regulations, or what not, or some individual files charges against it and there is an investigation. My amendment provides that upon the application of that station the hearing shall be conducted by an examiner or a commissioner at the town or city in which the station is located.

What I am trying to get at is the intolerable injustice of making a little station, or a large station, for that matter, but particularly a small station out in Idaho, Kansas, or elsewhere come to Washington for one of those hearings.

Let us see what this amounts to. Let us turn to page 6:

Witnesses summoned as hereinbefore authorized shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States. Witnesses shall be paid by the party at whose instance they are called.

The Radio Commission will call in a bunch of witnesses, and it has all of the power and wealth of the United States back of it. How is a little station out in the country going to compete with that situation? To be true, the station can subpœna somebody to come here, but where is the station going to get the money with which to pay mileage or fees for witnesses to come from one of the distant States? I submit it is but justice that the commission should go to that station, either through a commissioner or through an examiner, and take the testimony there. Of course, if the station wants to come to Washington and that is convenient for the commission that will be all right. My amendment simply makes it possible for that station upon its application to have the hearing held by a commissioner or an examiner at its home town.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. What about your final appeal? Does the gentleman want to provide an amendment for that?

Mr. McGUGIN. I will do that later on in another place. This is just for the hearing. This is surely in keeping with every bit of government we have in this country. We enact all of our Federal statutes here in this Congress, but we have courts all over the country. We do not make everybody come to Washington for trial, and if a radio station is located in Kansas, in Indiana, Missouri, or Texas, I think it should have the right to a trial in its home town instead of coming to Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice from a reading of the amendment that the gentleman requires all such hearings to be held at the place where the station is located. Would the gentleman compel the commission as a body to go to these local places to determine these questions?

Mr. McGUGIN. No; I merely mean to take the evidence.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman's amendment is much broader than that.

Mr. McGUGIN. I did not want it to be any broader than that. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to modify my amendment in accordance with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withdraw his amendment temporarily so that he may make the modification he desires?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will do that, I will take a little time while he is preparing it.

Mr. McGUGIN. I will withdraw my amendment for the time being.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I take the floor, Mr. Chairman, to inquire of the chairman of the committee why it is necessary to depute to employees of the commission the right to take testimony. You give the authority contained in this section to a commissioner, and examiner or an officer, and also specify employee. The person who is to take this testimony should be, I take it, either a member of the commission or an examiner or an officer. We should not vest this great authority to determine the policy of the commission in a mere employee of the commission. These examiners, or whoever will take the testimony, will make a report back to the commission at Washington, and he should be some person of a higher grade than a mere employee. Of course, all examiners are employees, all officers, in the broad sense, are employees, but all employees are not examiners or officers.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state that this is simply in accordance with what is generally done. For instance, they could send an attorney, and perhaps some member of the legal division would be better qualified than an examiner. The words " or employee " are simply included in order to embrace such other official, under the commission, whom it might be best to send on that particular occasion. They have a legal division and, of course, we could specify " or attorney or others," but I want to state to the gentleman from Wisconsin and others that these provisions are in substantial accord with other provisions under the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the Court of Claims, and other Government activities which have been found, after long experience, to be the best way to handle the situation. It has been found from experience that the 1927 law is too narrow and restrictive, and under the procedure all the hearings of the commission or of any member thereof were heard in the city of Washington.

The gentleman from Kansas is complaining, but this bill is simply seeking to correct the very thing he is complaining about, and the authority rests in the commission without his proposed amendment, because all of the commission, any one of the commission, or any other designated official may go to any point in Kansas or any other point in the United States and hold hearings in order to prevent the necessity of the witnesses coming to Washington, but they do not have this authority unless it is given to them under the pending bill.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOCH. As I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, it is not to provide the authority which the bill gives, but to make it mandatory that upon application by the station involved in the particular case, the evidence shall be taken in the city where the station itself is located.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to say that the gentleman states an absolutely impossible case. There is no case, there can be no case, in which only one person or one company is interested in the granting of a radio license, because you can not grant a license without its affecting others who have a license to broadcast upon the channel in question.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to suggest the case of a little station which was located in my own town. This was a little radio station of 100 watts, or something of that sort, and for some unknown reason, against the protest of everyone within the radius of that station's influence, 50 miles——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MURPHY. The commission sent their inspectors into my town, and just as they do sometimes when they want to get rid of somebody in the Government they send inspectors into a post office, or they send inspectors into a bank or something of that sort when they want to cause trouble; such a procedure was followed with reference to this particular station. There was no one else interested but the people in my home town. If they had had a chance to have a hearing there, if the commission had allowed the people to come in and tell what they wanted with reference to this particular radio activity it would have been fair; but as it was, they had no chance.

Mr. DAVIS. I may state to the gentleman from Ohio that the inspector to which he refers is not under the Radio Commission at all. The inspectors are under the Radio Division of the Department of Commerce. This bill proposes to make it possible to hold hearings anywhere in the country and to hear all parties concerned and to take testimony, but, in the final analysis, the decision is rendered not by that examiner, not by that particular official taking the evidence, but by the full commission, because it takes a full majority of the commission to decide any of these matters.

The entire bill in numerous particulars broadens the rights and in no sense restricts the rights of anybody.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give his view as to whether the case cited by the gentleman from Kansas so as to make it mandatory upon the commission to have the examination at the site where the station is located?

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman from Kansas admitted himself out of court when he said that. Of course, if there were a station interested over here and another one over there, it would be proper for the hearing to be held in Washington on neutral ground. There is no instance in which that is not true, because whenever the question arises as to whether a license shall be granted to a station, the next question that arises is that they have to be assigned to some particular wave length and some particular power, and so forth.

Now, here is something that seems to be apparently forgotten. By nature these wave lengths are greatly restricted. There are only 89 wave lengths for broadcasting, and we share 9 of those with Canada. We have already 612 or 615 broadcasting stations, and thousands of more applications. They are coming in all the time—constantly—applications for new licenses.

You can not grant new licenses, there are already too many licenses, already too many radio stations. They ought to be reduced. I have said repeatedly that the Radio Commission ought to have the courage to make the necessary reductions. The reductions should come in the cleared channels and high-powered stations as a general proposition.

There is already an average of 54 stations on all the wave lengths assigned for local stations. There are anywhere from 8 to 15 stations assigned on what are known as regional channels. There is no room for any more as a general proposition, unless they reduce the cleared channels. The elimination of 10 cleared channels would make it possible to have several hundred additional local stations.

But whenever you propose to grant a new license the question arises if you grant the license and operate on the wave length at that particular place who will that interfere with, and anybody else within the range is interested and has a right to be heard, and the law requires that everybody that will be affected by it shall be notified and given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, a great many people confuse the range of the stations with the range of the audible program. It is admitted, and is familiar to every radio engineer, that there is a range of the signal all the way from ten to one hundred times as far as the audible program. It is a common experience for a small-powered station to send its signals across the continent. The signals are not heard, but they do affect the other stations.

Do you know what this roaring and whistling is that you hear over the radio? That is the very thing I am talking about—it is the interference of signals from other stations in most instances.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain—because it is new in nomenclature—what he means by signaling?

Mr. DAVIS. They are sound waves emitted from the radio transmitter—they go through the air, just as you throw a pebble into a pond and you see the waves start and cover the pond. This is simply in the air instead of the water.

Mr. BLAND. It is electrical energy.

Mr. DAVIS. That is what it is, a form of electrical energy. These signals go on and on, and when they come in contact with signals from another station on the same channel you hear this roaring and whistling which radio engineers call heterodyning. It is interference. One form of interference is called "blanketing."

Now, under this proposed amendment you could not have a case where it did not affect some other station.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time just to clear up a matter in my own mind. The chairman of this committee that has charge of the bill made a statement that there are altogether too many radio stations now. I would like to have him tell the members of the committee how many of these radio channels are controlled by one operating agency.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me say to the gentleman that I, with other members of the committee, have been studying the problem for many years, and we have some information and definite convictions about various matters that have been discussed here to-day.

We have confined our discussion to the bill. Most of the discussion has had no relation whatever to any provision in the bill.

Now, as to the question raised by the gentleman from Ohio, I have expressed myself repeatedly upon that subject. A large number of the stations with high power and with cleared wave lengths are on what is known as the National Broadcasting chain. I will state I do not think they should be. I have repeatedly spoken on that here. I have said that it is not right for one group to have the cream of the broadcasting facilities. I have said it before and I say it again, that there is no reascn why a station, because it is a chain station, should be on a cleared wave length or should have high power, because the two leading companies which furnish chain programs have networks extending all over this country, and each station feeds the program to its area, and for that reason they do not need high-powered stations.

I should think that if each of those groups had one cleared wave length in three sections of the country it would be ample. I have inveighed against that; I have criticized it. I know the objection of people to getting the same program everywhere they turn the dial.

In that connection, after the Davis equalization amendment was enacted I addressed a communication to the Radio Commission in which I made certain suggestions. One was that there should not be cleared in excess of 25 wave lengths, or 5 for each zone, and I thought that was too much.

Mr. MURPHY. How many are there now?

Mr. DAVIS. There are 40 so-called cleared channels.

Mr. MURPHY. They are in the control of one group of business interests?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I can not agree to that literally, except in this way: Most of those are what are known as chain stations, but they are not under the control of any one concern, simply because they have a traffic arrangement to receive a program. Most of those stations are otherwise independent, but they have a contract with the National Broadcasting Co. or the Columbia Broadcasting Co. to receive their chain programs. The R. C. A. group, so called, controls and owns a larger number of those stations, and I do not think any group ought to be permitted to have more than one. Now, if 15 of those cleared channels were released for local and regional use, it would take care of the local situation which the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Texas have complained about, because there are now only six channels set aside for local stations, and they have an average of over 50 to the channel.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS. The remainder of the channels may be said to be set aside for regional use. Now, that is a matter that is not fixed by law. There has been a great deal of discussion as to whether Congress should invade the administrative field sufficiently to undertake to determine and direct those matters. It is rather difficult to undertake to do that, and many of us who are not in accord with some of the things the commission has been doing have hoped that the situation would be improved so that it would not be necessary for the Congress to invade the field of administration.

Mr. MURPHY. I am deeply grateful to the splendid chairman of this committee for the information he has given. We have 89 channels through which radio can flow, and 9 of those channels are shared with Canada. Forty channels are all that the great American public has access to. They took a little 100-watt station away from my town. They did not give them a chance.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. How many hours did they have on that?

Mr. MURPHY. They had an hour now and then.

Mr. SIROVICH. That is because the Radio Commission has been too arbitrary in everything it is doing.

Mr. MURPHY. Absolutely; and here we are with a bill to-day trying to straighten out affairs, and all that is in it is to say that they can not advertise lotteries over the radio. I wish the gentleman's great committee, in whom this House has implicit confidence, would get right down to the root of things and say to the Radio Commission, "You must give the small stations some consideration. You can not, without real reason, take away from communities the enjoyment of their local radio station."

That is what is being done everywhere, and not once has a wave length been taken from this great operating company that controls 50 per cent of the radio channels of this country to-day. I say to the chairman of this great committee that I hope that he will find some way of taking care of the common fellow, and I am one of those, and my community is composed of just that kind of folks. We love our little radio station, and it has been taken away, and we can not get it back under existing law.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. I am very much interested in the statement the gentleman was making. In my State of South Carolina we came in with a request for a broadcasting station and were allowed a small station. Since that time they have been trying to get the power of that station increased, but up to this time they have been unable to get an increase. They have a station down there that really can not be heard outside of the limits of the State. I would like to know if there is anything in the bill whereby we might remedy that situation for the State of South Carolina?

Mr. DAVIS. As I said before, this bill does not change the substantive law. That, of course, is a matter of administration; and further, with reference to what the gentleman from Ohio suggested, I want to say, if the gentleman will pardon a personal reference, I believe I have made more speeches on the floor of this House than any other Member undertaking to protect the rights of the general public with respect to radio and against the Radio Trust, because, gentlemen, we have one. I have introduced measures and proposed amendments along that line, some of which have been adopted into law, some of which I was never able to get considered, and some of which were defeated on the floor of the House, and others of which were defeated in the Senate.

So far as I am concerned, as long as I am a Member of the House and of the committee which has jurisdiction over radio legislation I intend to keep up that fight to the best of my ability. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: Page 4, line 9, after the word "hearing" insert "Provided, That in any hearing in which only one radio station is involved the commission shall, upon the application of such station, take the direct evidence in such case before an examiner or commissioner in the town or city in which such station is located."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will remember, these hearings nearly always involve more than one station.

Mr. McGUGIN. No; they do not.

Mr. BLANTON. Some of them do, and most of them do.

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not know how to write an amendment which will take care of those other cases. Of course, the only cases I can reach with this amendment are those cases where there is only one station involved. What other station was involved when they took Norman Baker's station away from him? What other station was involved when they took Bob Shuler's station away from him in Los Angeles? What other station was involved when they took Brinkley's station away from him? What I am trying to strike at through this amendment is a case where the Radio Commission takes it upon itself to go out and cancel a license. I want it written into the law that when they do that they must go to the home town of the station involved before they can rob that station of its right to exist. I want that done instead of having the Radio Commission tell them to come to Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. Why does not the gentleman revise his amendment and provide that before the Radio Commission can cancel a license and take it away or suspend there must be a local hearing, because they will always hold that another station is involved. If we passed the gentleman's amendment as it is, it would not amount to anything. The gentleman should provide in his amendment that before they can cancel a license and take a station away from anybody there must be a local hearing. Then we can go along with the gentleman.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. Does not the gentleman know that as a matter of fact a commissioner or examiner is very frequently sent to the town or city in which the station is located in order to hold hearings on the question of the station's license? I would refer the gentleman to the case of Detroit Radio Station WMBC, involving the celebrated Jerry Buckley, who was murdered in Detroit. It was one of the most sensational murders in the country. Jerry Buckley was a broadcaster over the above station, and some people attempted to take away the license of that station because he was accused, unjustly, as it was proved, of blackmailing and extortion over the radio. In the WMBC case an examiner came to Detroit and held the hearings there and heard many witnesses and arguments of lawyers. As a result Station WMBC was exonerated fully.

Mr. McGUGIN. I want these to be all the hearings that are held. I do not want them to hold hearings in the town where the station involved is located and then come to Washington and hold some more hearings. I want such a station put in the position of having hearings that are held in the open and not have any star-chamber stuff like the gentleman from Ohio mentioned.

There is nothing wrong with this amendment. It is a plain, fair amendment. If the gentleman from Texas can add something to it and take in more territory, I hope he will do so.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman say that the purpose and effect of his amendment would be that upon the conclusion of the taking of testimony in the city or town where the radio station is located the Government would be precluded from hearing any other testimony?

Mr. McGUGIN. It can take depositions but it can not hold another trial some place else. If you try me for murder in Alexandria, you can not try me again in Baltimore, Md.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But that is a case where the gentleman would be deprived of his life and liberty.

Mr. McGUGIN. And property, too. I want all of the direct testimony they take to be taken in the town where the station is located. If they want to take depositions somewhere else, that will be all right, but I do not want any more than one trial.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But a great mass of the testimony would be made up of the records here in Washington.

Mr. McGUGIN. But that would not be direct testimony. I do not refer to that but I do refer to testimony where you have witnesses and questions are asked of them.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Of course, there is a natural sympathy with the views as expressed by the gentleman proposing the amendment if it could be practically operated. But, as the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, said, there is no question involving the revocation, suspension, or granting of a license that is confined to a particular station. If it is the character of language that goes over the station it affects stations somewhere else.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman take the position that there has never been a case in which a license was canceled where there was not only one station involved?

Mr. BLAND. I do not see how that is possible.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am not talking about cases where one station is applying for the facilities of another station, but I am talking about a station that is charged with some violation of the regulations and they are attempting to take away its license. I do not see how any other station could be involved.

Mr. BLAND. The alleged misconduct in itself affects somebody else in some other location, because it affects some other party in interest and it also affects the public, more particularly the public.

Mr. McGUGIN. Take the Brinkley case. What other station was interested there, at least in the open? Of course, there was some underneath, but in the open it was the case between Brinkley and the Government.

Mr. BLAND. I am in thorough accord with the bringing of stations underneath into the open, but the point I am making is that there is always a station underneath, that there is always the public, and, therefore, it is not confined to one station; that it always affects some one else and there is always a public interest. Now, the amendment which has been offered by the committee, I believe, would largely cure the conditions of which the gentleman complains and of which other Members are complaining. The original law was that they shall have authority to hold hearings, summon witnesses, administer oaths, compel the production of books, documents, and papers, and to make such investigations as may be necessary in the performance of their duties.

The committee, because of the fact there was no provision for sending examiners out into the country and because there was no direction authorizing the hearings to be held or the examinations to be made elsewhere than at Washington and permitting the witnesses to be summoned locally, is now undertaking to write into the law an amendment that gives relief along the line that the gentleman from Kansas desires relief. I do not know; it may not go far enough. We are dealing with a new subject.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. HOCH. I do not quite follow the gentleman's reasoning when he argues that where the only question involved, for instance, is the nature of the language used over the particular station, that that particular case involves other stations.

Mr. BLAND. It involves the public.

Mr. HOCH. Oh, certainly; but the public, in general, is involved in all these things.

Mr. BLAND. That is just it.

Mr. HOCH. But no other station would come in to be a party to that particular hearing, and all that the gentleman from Kansas is trying to reach is a case where only one station is directly involved, and in such cases it shall be mandatory to take the direct testimony in the place where the station is located.

Mr. BLAND. The point at issue between the gentleman and myself is this: I would not say you should have the hearing at a certain place where other stations are not involved. There are others involved. I consider that the public that is listening over that station is also involved.

Mr. HOCH. That is true; but you could hold the hearing in such case, where the public interest was involved, at one place, just as though it was held here in Washington. The matter that the gentleman is trying to reach is avoiding the necessity of this one individual or the owners of this one station traveling to Washington for the hearing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON for the amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: Page 7, line 9, after the word "testifying," strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following proviso: "Provided, That before any license may be revoked or a station suspended a hearing shall be granted such station, held locally in the town or city where such station is located, in which all such evidence shall be heard."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and consent to the substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. BLANTON. I offered my amendment as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Kansas, and the gentleman from Kansas has accepted the amendment and has unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the amendment was offered before the other amendment was withdrawn and was subject to objection because it was not substantive, and it should now be offered anew.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Blanton amendment was again reported.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this section. I am perfectly willing to reserve the point of order, however.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would reserve his point of order until I have discussed the amendment a moment.

Mr. Chairman, I commend our friend from Kansas for offering this proposal. My proposed substitute is merely an effort to perfect his amendment.

The owner of the little radio station in my home city, which has daytime power of 250 watts only, has been bankrupt and almost put out of business in attending hearings here. He has made three different trips here to Washington, having to bring witnesses here, several of whom were ministers, at great cost from Texas, to refute unjust complaints that had been filed against his station.

These little stations can not stand this expense. It will bankrupt any of them, and they are entitled to a hearing.

I want to say, in reply to my friend from New York, Doctor CROWTHER—and he is a most estimable gentleman—that I did not say that every district and every small city ought to have a 5,000-watt station. I said the people in every congressional district of the United States could not afford to pay $1,000 a minute on some of these big hook ups to be heard locally. They are entitled to have their little local affairs put on the air through a small local station, and I repeat that every congressional district of the United States is entitled to a small local station, and I want to see every Congressman here have at least a small local station in his home town. The people are entitled to this. It would not in any way interfere with the big hook ups.

Upon what meat has this our friend from Schenectady fed that he has grown so cocky? You do not hear any of the Representatives here from the real metropolises of the United States belittling or making fun of the rural districts. Why, the gentleman from Schenectady, Doctor CROWTHER, intimated there was no talent in any of the rural districts except those having big metropolises. I want to tell him that there is as much talent in every rural district in the West and South as there is in Schenectady. [Laughter and applause.]

Our great Republican leader here, the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL, our good friend, who has been chairman of the Rules Committee and who has been a member of the Republican triumvirate here for the last few years and who has helped to conduct the affairs of the Nation, comes from Potsdam, a little town of 4,000 inhabitants.

Uncle Joe Cannon, whom we all loved dearly and who performed distinguished service here for almost the average lifetime, hailed from the little city of Danville, Ill., which is smaller than my home city by at least five thousand.

Our present distinguished Democratic majority leader, Mr. RAINEY, hails from a farm adjoining the little city of Carrollton, Ill., which has only about 1,500 inhabitants, yet there is located there the Illinois College, which is a coeducational college, which did itself the honor last year to confer the degree of doctor of laws upon our Democratic leader.

Our former great Speaker, honored and beloved by everyone, Hon. Champ Clark, who came very near being President of the United States, came from Bowling Green, Mo., a little town of about 2,000 people.

Why, the present great Speaker of this House, than whom there has been no greater, comes from a splendid little city of 5,286 inhabitants, and yet, this quasi-big, important tooth-puller from Schenectady becomes so cocky that he makes fun of the little places. [Laughter.]

If it had not been for the splendid boys in my district and State who have gone to Schenectady and taken a business course in the technical college which they have by much attendance made great there would not be much of Schenectady. You will find those men from Texas in the leading banks in New York City. One of my classmates, J. Howard Audrey, born and raised in the little town of Godfrey, Tex., with less than 500 people, was called to New York by leading banks there. He first went there on a salary of $25,000, and he now gets about twice that salary in a great bank in New York City. And yet this big dentist from Schenectady makes fun of the little country districts; this so-called big man from a quasi-big town of less than 100,000 people, for Schenectady has a population of 95,685.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman from New York, Doctor CROWTHER, that I represent more people in my district than he has in his district by about the whole population of Schenectady, and they are the finest people in the world.

The gentleman talks about the cowboy crooners. We have "The Cowboy Band" from Texas, from Simmons University in Abilene, which has traveled all over the United States and given concerts all over Europe. It is internationally well known.

Besides Simmons University, one of the first class, I have two other colleges of the first class in my home city—McMurry College and Abilene Christian College. We have a fine college in Eastland, Tex., the Warner Memorial University, and we have the Randolph College at Cisco, Tex., all in my district. We also have Howard-Payne College and Daniel-Baker College in Brownwood, Tex., in my district. The gentleman from New York ought to come down there and find out just how very much fine talent we have all over my splendid district, and he would never malign it again.

You never heard the great scientist from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], who now seeks to ask me a question, making fun of people residing in the small-town districts.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. I am in cordial sympathy with the gentleman from Texas in trying to correct this very evil. I do not know of a more autocratic and tyrannical commission than the members of the Federal Radio Commission. They have ridden ruthlessly over the small stations of the country. The time has now arrived to stop their nefarious conduct. To help our distinguished chairman I have introduced a bill to abolish the five radio commissioners and transfer their work to a director of radio in the Department of Commerce, who will do justice to all.

Mr. BLANTON. I congratulate the gentleman on his proposed consolidation.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is the gentleman in sympathy with my bill, which I intend to press very shortly?

Mr. BLANTON. I am. I asked the chairman when he first called up this bill why he did not consolidate these radio bureaus.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the point of order I make is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is not germane to this particular section. As I recall the amendment, it refers to the revocation and suspension of licenses. The original act and this one, which is now pending before the committee, if examined, will show that section 9 of the pending act deals with revocation, and section 14 of the original radio act deals with revocation. There is nothing in this section that deals with the revocation and suspension of licenses.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is certainly germane. This section is the only one which provides for hearings. The Congress of the United States, the Members of which are the Representatives of the people, and in whose power and authority the ether seems to have been lodged for regulation, has the right to provide where hearings shall be held. It certainly has the right to provide that they can not snatch up people in Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, San Francisco, Seattle, Washington, Texas, and Florida and make them go to the expense of coming to Washington for a hearing. Congress certainly has the right, in providing for hearings, to say where those hearings shall be held.

The amendment is germane and the point of order should not lie.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for about three minutes on this point of order. It was my original amendment, and I permitted this substitute, and so I ask unanimous consent to discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right. He may proceed.

Mr. McGUGIN. This amendment comes in in line 9. Just before that language appears the following:

> The commission may hold public hearings and order testimony to be taken by deposition, at any designated place in connection with any proceeding or investigation authorized by this act and may require the attendance and testimony of witnesses and produce evidence, documentary or otherwise—

And so on. This is merely a proviso that in such hearings where a license is being revoked, before that license is revoked they must go to the station and give them a hearing. I think it is an essential amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment now before the House relates to the right to revoke a license. The section pertaining to licenses is section 9. Here we have only the question relating to hearings. I think if the gentleman will read the amendment closely enough, he will see it is not germane to the question of hearings, but it is germane to the question relating to licenses.

Mr. BLANTON. But this particular paragraph of the bill relates to hearings, and the amendment is pertinent here, and it is also pertinent to paragraph 9. But this is the paragraph that provides for hearings at any place, and the amendment is germane to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chairman will indulge me for a moment, the amendment is so drawn that it involves matters that are not germane, that are extraneous to the matter under consideration. Therefore the Chair must hold that it is not germane to the matter in issue.

I ask unanimous consent, so that the House may have the full import of the amendment, to have it again reported.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in that connection I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk first read the last part of the paragraph which it is sought to add the proviso to, being that part not read by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN], and then the House will clearly see it is germane, because the part read already provides for all hearings at any place in the United States, and this is merely an additional proviso, regulating those hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the section and the amendment following.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the section and the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly obvious that the purpose of this amendment is to prescribe the circumstances and conditions under which a license may be revoked or canceled. The manner, because it involves the taking of testimony, is not the subject matter of this amendment. It is the revocation or cancellation of the license that is the subject matter, and it is therefore not germane to this section.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the gentleman from New Jersey confuses what appears on the face to be the point of this amendment, with the real substance of it, and in determining whether it is germane or not we must go to the substance.

Now, clearly this does not change in any way the right of revocation or cancellation of a license. It does not deal with the substantive matter with reference to revocation of licenses at all. It simply picks out one class of hearings and this section deals entirely with hearings, and provides that certain hearings, in which is involved the question of the revocation or cancellation of a license, shall be heard at a particular place. In other words, this is not in any way a limitation upon the power of revocation or upon the essential or substantive conditions as to which a revocation shall be had, but is simply a direction, within the purpose of this paragraph, that certain hearings shall be held in certain places. In other words, I hold it is precisely the same as though the amendment had read "in any hearings involving the question of suspension, they shall be held in a certain place." Certainly, if the amendment were offered in that form there could not be any objection. The amendment is germane. I contend that the mere fact that it is phrased in different language does not affect the real question as to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GLOVER). The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair must look to the form as well as the substance. It appears to the Chair that section 9 is the section dealing directly with the question of the cancellation or revocation of license, and the amendment would probably be germane to that section. The Chair, however, does not think that it is germane to the section to which it is offered, and therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I reoffer the amendment, if I may, with the first sentence reading, "Provided, That in any hearing in which is involved solely the question of revocation or cancellation of a license," and then follow with the balance of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: Page 7, line 9, after the word "testifying," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add the following proviso: "Provided, with respect to the hearings provided for in this paragraph, that before any license may be revoked or a station suspended, a hearing shall be granted to such station held locally in the town or city where such station is located, in which all such evidence shall be heard."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order previously made as to the amendment for precisely the same reasons. If a subject matter is out of order, you can not make it in order by juggling the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I move to amend, on page 7, line 9, by striking out the period, inserting a semicolon and adding the following:

Provided further, That in the case of any hearing involving only the revocation or cancellation of the license of only one radio station the commission shall, upon the application of such station, provide for the taking of direct testimony by an examiner or by a commissioner at the town or city in which such station is located.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not before the committee. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman from Kansas send his amendment to the desk in writing.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: Page 7, line 9, after the word "testifying," strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following: "Provided further, That in any hearing on the question of revocation or cancellation of the license of only one radio station, the commission shall, upon the application of said station, take the direct evidence before an examiner or a commissioner in the town or city where the said station is located."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to strike out the enacting clause, which was simply pro forma.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground it is not germane to this section.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point of order against the gentleman's point of order, that business having transpired the gentleman's point of order comes too late. The Chair having recognized the gentleman from Texas to withdraw his motion to strike out the enacting clause, and that was done by unanimous consent, and that being business that intervened between the offering of the amendment, and the point of order, the gentleman's point of order is out of order because it comes too late.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The Chair will certainly take notice of the fact that I was on my feet while the gentleman was submitting his request to announce that I wish to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey was on his feet at the time, and the Chair will hear him on the point of order.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, this again deals with the procedure and the circumstances under which licenses can be revoked or canceled, and not only the cancellation of licenses or the revocation of licenses generally, but in particular instances where only one station is involved. It certainly deals with the question of revocation and cancellation, and the fact that hearings are held in such procedure does not make it germane to this section.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be heard very briefly. The section before us deals very broadly with the whole question of hearings. These hearings may involve, and would involve, all sorts of substantive questions. The section sets out the manner and method of holding hearings and provides for subpœnaing witnesses and all that sort of thing. All that this amendment does is to say that among the different kinds of hearings involved—among them the question of revocation or cancellation—with which this section deals; one particular kind of hearings, namely, those in which there is involved the question of cancellation or revocation of only one station, evidence shall be heard in a particular place. Certainly, having set out broadly the conditions and the manner in which various hearings shall be held, it is entirely germane in connection with this provision to say that certain of these hearings, involving one of these questions, shall be heard in a certain manner. If this is not germane, I do not see how one could draft a germane amendment to this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair thought he made it plain awhile ago that such an amendment might be germane to section 9, which deals with this question. The Chair holds it is not germane to this section and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, with great respect and regard for the Chair, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, because if the amendment is not germane to this paragraph, it might be held that it would not be germane to section 9, because there is no mention whatever in that section of hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he is following the parliamentarian and thinks his statement is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the House has an able and a very distinguished parliamentarian, but I believe the ruling is wrong, and I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee.

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Section 14 of the radio act of 1927 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 47, sec. 94) is amended by striking out the words "Any station license shall be revocable by the commission," in the first line of said section, and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Any station license may be revoked, modified, or suspended by the commission."

Said section is further amended by striking out all of the proviso in said section and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Pro- vided, however, That no license shall be revoked, modified, or suspended until the licensee shall have been notified in writing of the proceedings for such revocation, modification, or suspension, the cause for the proposed action, and shall have been given reasonable opportunity to show cause why an order of revocation, modification, or suspension should not be issued.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 11, line 11, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the language which I submitted a few minutes ago in connection with section 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOCH: Page 11, at the end of line 11, insert "Provided further, That in any hearing on the question of revocation or suspension of the license of only one radio station the commission shall, upon the application of said station, take the direct evidence before an examiner or a commissioner in the town or city where the said station is located."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this section of the bill. There is no provision or statement here as to a hearing on any question. The language is "no license shall be revoked, modified, or suspended until the licensee shall have been notified in writing," and so forth. There is no provision for any hearing.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the Chair I do not think it is necessary that I should take any time on this question. The section deals certainly with the revocation or suspension of licenses. Now, all that my amendment provides is that this revocation, according to the interpretation given a little while ago, shall only be had in cases where hearings are held in certain places.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the statute and is prepared to rule.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and on this section close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment and the section close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I made that motion in order to have five minutes in opposition to this amendment, and that some other Member might have five minutes who desires to support the amendment if he desires. I would like to follow any Member who desires to support it.

Mr. HOCH rose.

Mr. DAVIS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, all this motion does is to provide that in a case where the question is simply the revocation or suspension of a license of one radio station, the direct evidence shall be taken in the community where the station is located. Those interested will not have to come all the way to Washington, perhaps clear across the country, which in many cases would result in not being heard at all.

This does not apply to a case where other stations are involved. The only question is, Shall a particular license be revoked or suspended? We think it unreasonable under the present practice to compel people who are defending an action of that sort to come all the way to Washington. It will not be any hardship on the Government; the public interest would justify sending an examiner to that particular place.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has the gentleman discovered in his own experience that these owners of small stations coming so far away find when they get here that they have to employ high-priced lawyers?

Mr. BLANTON. And if they do not do it, they get it in the neck.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition for four minutes, and then that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] have the other minute.

Mr. Chairman, this is a typical case of how ill-considered amendments offered on the floor to a bill, that has been carefully studied and considered by the committee, would work out. I wish to read to you the proposed amendment.

It is:

Provided further, That in any hearing on the question of revocation or suspension of license of one radio station the commission shall upon application of said station take the direct evidence before a commissioner or commissioners in the town or city where said station is located.

Now, this does not say that where there is only one station involved or only one station interested.

This provides for the revocation or suspension of a license of only one station. That is always true. There is always revocation or suspension of a license of only one station at a time.

It is unworkable. It would involve tremendous expense to the taxpayers. It would require the Radio Commission to go to every point in the United States and to take all of the evidence in the case at one place, even though there might be other witnesses at other points frequently far removed from the particular town in which the licensee resides. There really can be no instances when there would not be material witnesses and interested parties at other points. It shows where these things lead. To say that in one particular instance—the question of the revocation or suspension of a license—this shall be the procedure would be an expensive procedure, both unworkable and impractictable. It is subordinating the interests of all the people in order to favor one licensee.

In that connection I want to say that most of the speeches which have been made here do not even purport to be in the public interest. They are not in the interest of the great listening public, but are in the interest of some particular broadcaster. We do not owe the stations anything. There is not a broadcasting station in my district. Broadcasting is a matter of general public concern. It is a matter in which all the people are interested, and we should not forget the 130,000,000 people in thinking about some broadcasting station in our midst, and compel the Government to send the commission and examiners at public expense somewhere, to take the testimony of all the local friends of the station and disregard everybody everywhere else.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. McGUGIN. Why did the gentleman write it into this bill that the Radio Commission could do it if they desired to?

Mr. DAVIS. Simply because there are instances in which it is proper to send a member of the commission or an examiner to some point to take testimony, but it does not compel them to take all the evidence at one point. That is what this amendment proposes to do.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DAVIS. No; I can not yield further. My time is limited, and the gentleman has occupied a great deal of time.

Now, this proposes this extraordinary procedure in only one case. That is in the case of suspension or revocation. It is just as important upon an application for a license or an application for renewal as it is in case of revocation or cancellation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, if I have any time left I yield it to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I do not understand that under the 5-minute rule a Member can be recognized and then reserve the unused portion of his time and yield it to another.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, in my own right I ask recognition.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Under the custom of the House the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, was entitled to close the debate, and by such a subterfuge the gentleman can not deprive him of that privilege.

Mr. HOCH. I have not attempted to do that at all. I was addressing the Chair.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to disagree with the distinguished chairman of this committee, because I recognize the splendid work he has done, and I plead guilty, as the gentleman said, to being interested in one station. I am particularly interested in one station, KWKH, because I have seen the operator of that station, Mr. W. K. Henderson, brought to Washington at enormous expense time and again. Not only was he brought here, but an operator of a station from the State of Washington or Oregon, or any other State, could be brought here. I am interested in the operation of the individual, independent station. [Applause.] Why should a man operating a small station be jerked up and brought 2,500 miles to Washington and required to spend thousands of dollars to employ some attorney here to defend his rights? We are getting the Government too far from the people. [Applause.]

There are very few independent stations in this country. Not 5 per cent of the stations are independent. While some Members may not agree with what is broadcast from the station in which I am interested, still I say there is no station in this country that is more free to the public. People can go there and express their views on any question. Any Republican or Democrat or independent has that station open to him to go there and express his views at any time. He has broadcast over that station and predicted for the last two or three years things that have come to pass and are happening now in this Government of ours. [Applause.] He has warned the people against the concentration of wealth into the hands of a few. He was novel, perhaps, in the way he put it over, but he did put it over, and millions of people in the United States to-day agree with the views he expressed two or three years ago. Allow me to say to you, do not take the Government too far away from the people, and do not force people who are not able to do so to come here to Washington and pay high-priced attorneys to defend their rights. Let them test their rights in the courts of their own jurisdiction. [Applause.]

I certainly hope this amendment will be agreed to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to protect the owner of a station, but when there is included this language "that the direct testimony must be taken in the town or city in which the station is located," that will injure the broadcaster, because all of the direct testimony must be taken in the town or city and not some of it later in Washington in rebuttal or confirmation.

An actual experience in the most sensational radio case ever heard—that of Station WMBC—was that there were many witnesses who were required to testify. This amendment would foreclose, after the hearing is held in the town, the introduction of direct testimony in Washington to clear up disputed points. In the Detroit case, I believe, the station came in with some direct testimony later at Washington after the Detroit hearing and helped further to clear their right to the title to this station.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS) there were—ayes 47 and noes 63.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DAVIS and Mr. HOCH as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 56 and noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. Section 16 of the radio act of 1927, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 47, sec. 96), is amended, striking out the whole of said section and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 16. (a) An appeal may be taken in the manner hereinafter provided to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia from any decision or order of the commission granting or denying, in whole or in part, an application for a station license, for the renewal or modification of a station license, for a construction permit, or from any decision or order of the commission revoking, suspending, or modifying, or refusing to revoke, suspend, or modify, a station license or a construction permit. Such appeal may be taken by any party to the proceeding in which the order was made, whether an applicant, licensee, permittee, or intervenor, except that, in case of a decision or order revoking or suspending a station license, the appeal may be taken by the licensee only.

"(b) Such appeal shall be taken by filing with said court, within 20 days after the decision or order complained of is effective, a notice in writing of such appeal and a statement of the reasons therefor, together with (1) proof of personal service of a true copy of said notice and statement upon the commission, and of service thereof by registered mail upon all other parties to the proceeding in which the order complained of was made (such service to be deemed complete upon proof of the deposit in the United States mails of a duly registered envelope containing a copy of said notice and statement, addressed to the party to be served, or to his attorney of record, at the address of either as shown by the records of the commission), and (2) a bond in such sum as the court may direct, conditioned that the party appealing will pay the costs of the proceedings if such costs be finally assessed against him. Unless a later date is specified by the commission as part of its decision or order, the decision or order complained of shall be considered to be effective as of the date on which public announcement thereof is made at the office of the commission in the city of Washington.

"(c) Within 30 days after the service of said notice upon it the commission shall file with the court the originals or certified copies of all papers and evidence filed with or presented to it in the proceeding in which the decision or order appealed from was made, together with a copy of its decision or order and its findings of fact upon which its decision or order was based.

"(d) Any party to the proceeding before the commission may join in the appeal or appear as a party respondent by filing with the court a notice of appearance, together with proof of service thereof by registered mail upon the party appealing and upon the commission, within 30 days after the service of said notice upon him, or any other person may be permitted by the court to intervene upon a showing of interest in the subject matter and reasonable cause for failure to appear before the commission. Any person may at any time be made a party to the proceedings by the court if, in the opinion of the court, his presence is necessary or proper to a complete determination of the cause.

"(e) At the earliest convenient time the court shall hear and determine the appeal upon the record before it, and shall have power, upon such record, to enter a judgment affirming or reversing the decision or order of the commission, and, in event the court shall render a decision and enter an order reversing the decision of the commission, it shall remand the case to the commission to carry out the judgment of the court: Provided, however, That the review of the court shall be limited to questions of law and that findings of fact by the commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive unless it shall clearly appear that the findings of the commission are arbitrary or capricious.

"(f) The court may, subject to the foregoing limitation, upon notice to the commission and to all other parties to the appeal, after hearing, and for good cause shown, enter an order staying action of the commission under the order appealed from, in whole or in part, upon the giving of a bond by the party applying for the stay in such amount and with such terms and conditions as the court may deem proper. Pending a hearing upon the application for stay, the court may enter a temporary stay for a period of not to exceed 15 days.

"(g) The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia under this section to review any decision or order of the commission shall be exclusive, and the judgment of said court shall be final, except that it shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari as provided in section 240 of Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 347), and that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the application of section 239 of the Judicial Code, as amended (relating to certification of questions of law) (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 346), to cases in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia arising under this section."

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWING: On page 14, line 3, after the word "court," insert a period and strike out all of the proviso ending in line 8.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to call your attention to that proviso which is, "that the review of the court shall be limited to questions of law." So far as the practical operation of this proviso is concerned, it might just as well stop there because the rest of it, while it is beautiful language, adds nothing. It proceeds to say:

And the findings of fact by the commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive.

Well, substantial evidence means any evidence which is relevant and tends to support the finding. To make that more clear, the rest of the language is important. It says the findings "shall be conclusive unless it shall clearly appear that the findings of the commission are arbitrary or capricious." In other words, if there is any substantial evidence to support the findings, then the court is precluded from considering the questions of fact.

In other words, it would not be enough to show to the Court of Appeals by a clear preponderance of the evidence that the Radio Commission had made a mistake as to the facts. It would not be sufficient—and I challenge contradiction upon this—to show that the evidence proved beyond reasonable doubt the contrary to what the commission found the facts to be. In nearly every criminal case the defendant, even though he is found guilty, has substantial evidence to support his side, and yet the jury may find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. If we apply that to a radio case and an appeal was taken to the courts, although the evidence proved the case against the commission beyond a reasonable doubt, the court of appeals could do nothing if there was some substantial evidence to support the commission's findings. I say this language absolutely prevents an appeal in 8 out of 10 cases because in 8 out of 10 cases where they have suspended a station under the exercise of their power of censorship over the language that has been used or over the statements that have been made, it is entirely a question of fact and there is involved no question of law except the general constitutional question of the right of free speech. Yet you immediately proceed by this language to rob the court of its power to review the only issue there is between the station and the Radio Commission.

Why is Congress afraid to trust the courts with questions of justice involving radio? It is no more complicated than a thousand other questions that are every day referred to the court for decision. Why can not these cases be heard by the court on the merits and justice done? The court will have the entire record and all of the evidence before it and can render a decision which will do justice to all parties in interest. Why must we prevent it? Why must we hamstring our courts in radio cases? By this language you are restricting the courts to purely questions of law unless the courts are convinced that the findings of the commission are arbitrary or capricious. But if the commission were convicted of acting arbitrarily and in a capricious manner that would be basis enough for impeaching them and turning them out of their offices. That ought not to be necessary in order to get justice and fair treatment for an individual on an appeal from a decision by the Radio Commission. This language therefore should be stricken from the law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. In answer to the gentleman's question, does the gentleman have any doubt that the very reason and very purpose of this bill is to hamstring the courts?

Mr. SWING. I do not know what the reason was for putting it in, but I do know of plenty of reason why this language should be taken out of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. In the first place, I wish to explain that the pending bill does not amend the law in that particular. The language which the gentleman from California has moved to strike out on page 14, from line 3 to line 8, is identical with the present law. We simply incorporated in the bill the entire present law with the amendment so as to recite it as amended. In other words, that is the law, and I want to state that the law was as the gentleman now would have it, and after a trial of it the Congress, in 1930, passed a law for the specific purpose of changing the law and making it as it is now, which law was approved July 1, 1930. There was practically nothing in it except that provision. It was fully considered by the committee and by the Congress and is already the law.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SWING. Does not the gentleman think Congress can learn something in a year's trial?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; but we had already learned something after several years' trial under the old system.

Another thing, there is nothing arbitrary or radical about this. It is the law already in the Federal courts. It is the law in nearly all the States of the Union that, upon appeal, the finding of facts by the jury or by the court acting without the intervention of a jury is conclusive if there is material evidence or substantial evidence to support the finding.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield for a question.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman tell the committee why the gentleman believes that the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is a more appropriate court to hear an appeal on a radio station in Tennessee than the United States district court of his own State?

Mr. DAVIS. That is not the proposed amendment.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman give me time to get such an amendment in at the end of this discussion?

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman has taken up most of the time already.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman tell us whether he knows of any language in any law, other than this one, governing appeals providing that the review of the courts shall be limited to questions of law?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; in my own State we have a statute providing that the findings of the jury or the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the court, when acting without the intervention of the jury, upon appeal, shall be conclusive upon the facts if there is material evidence to support the verdict or judgment.

Mr. SWING. That does not answer my question about the language.

Mr. DAVIS. I may say that I was one of those who at first advocated permitting the district courts throughout the country to have jurisdiction; but I became convinced, as I think all the members of the committee have who have been studying these problems, that this is impracticable, for two reasons: In the first place, you would have a wide variety of decisions instead of uniformity, and in the second place, by reason of certain decisions that have been rendered, we think it is doubtful, and, in fact, the Solicitor of the Department of Commerce gave the opinion at the time, that it was very doubtful whether a law would be valid which permitted an appeal from an administrative department of the Government to a United States district court; and by reason of certain decisions it was believed that such appeals could only be taken to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: On page 12, line 4, at the end of line 4, add the following:

"Provided, In any order where the commission has revoked a license or refused to renew a license, the United States district court in which said station is located shall have exclusive jurisdiction for appeal from the order of the commission, and such district court shall hear said appeal by trial de novo. Pending such appeal the station shall remain on the air under bond to the appellate court in such sum and under such terms as such court shall decree."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk completing the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 13. No person shall broadcast by means of any radio station for which a license is required by any law of the United States, any information concerning any lottery, gift enterprise, or similar scheme, offering prizes dependent in whole or in part upon lot or chance, or any information concerning any ticket, certificate, or instrument representing any chance, share, or interest in or dependent upon the event of any lottery, gift enterprise, or similar scheme offering prizes dependent in whole or in part upon lot or chance, or any list of prizes or information concerning any list of prizes awarded by means of any such scheme, and any person so doing, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Is this the law to-day or a new law?

Mr. DAVIS. As I have explained heretofore, this is a new section.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that they can give things away now by lottery, and this would prohibit it.

Mr. DAVIS. This new law applies to radio. The gentleman is aware that we have a Federal law making it unlawful for any matter advertising a lottery or gift enterprise to be carried through the mail. I suppose every State in the Union has a State law against lotteries. But this is the first time we have directly prohibited it over the radio.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GLOVER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7716) amending the radio act of 1927, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. HOCH. I can not say that I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there any other Member of the House opposed to the bill who wishes to make a motion to recommit? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read the motion to recommit, as follows:

Motion to recommit offered by Mr. HOCH: Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries with instructions to report the same back to the House with the following amendment, to wit: On page 11, in line 11, at the end of the word "issued," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following additional proviso, to wit: "Provided further, That in any hearing on the question of revocation or suspension of the license of a station, the commission shall, before its examiner or otherwise, upon the application of the station, hold the hearing and take the evidence in the town or city where the said station is located."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOCH) there were 39 ayes and 110 noes.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-two Members present, not a quorum.

The doors were closed, and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absent Members.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 189, not voting 116, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks as to the operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, in so far as it seeks to bring relief to insolvent State banks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as disclosed by the extended committee hearings, as well as the debate in both the Senate and the House, the purpose of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act was primarily to bring aid to the banks of the country and was not intended to prefer national banks to any other class of banking institutions either as regards loans to operating institutions or advances that will aid in liquidation. The whole object was to liquefy frozen assets in both State and national institutions, whether solvent or insolvent.

In spite of this express purpose of the measure, it is surprising to learn that few, if any, insolvent State banks can be aided by this measure. Any kind of Federal aid requires the fulfillment of two conditions:

First. There must be affirmative action on the part of the Congress of the United States making available such assistance.

Second. There must be State statutes authorizing some one on behalf of the States to accept the benefits of such relief. These State enabling acts are as essential as initial Federal legislation.

In the present instance Congress has acted in the matter of the extension of these benefits, but an extremely small number of States have any provision for the acceptance of this much-needed relief. Included in this number of States where insolvent State relief banks are precluded from relief is my own State of West Virginia which furnishes a typical example of the conditions in a number of other States.

Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act provides that loans and advances shall be made to both insolvent State and national banks and as security for these loans the assets of the insolvent institution must be pledged. The receivers or liquidating agents are the proper persons to effect this pledge, but these receivers can only do those things which the State statutes authorize them to do. Section 32, article 8, of chapter 31 of the Code of West Virginia, defines the rights and powers of receivers of insolvent State banks and gives them the right only to sell the institution's assets. Therefore, as a condition precedent to relief for insolvent State banks, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act presupposes the existence of a power on the part of the receivers which really does not exist.

In this same connection the powers and duties of receivers and liquidating agents of national banks are circumscribed by Federal statutes. Formerly they had no power to pledge the assets of their institutions and even to make available the benefits of the Reconstruction Corporation act to the insolvent national banks provision had to be made in section 5 of the act whereby these receivers and liquidating agents could pledge the securities of their respective banks. In other words, Congress has enabled the receivers and liquidating agents of national banks to take advantage of the relief intended while it still remains necessary for the various States to clothe the receivers of insolvent State banks with similar powers.

NECESSITY OF AID FOR INSOLVENT STATE BANKS

In my opinion the insolvent State banks are more in need of relief than the insolvent national banks for two reasons:

First. There are a greater number of depositors in insolvent State banks.

Second. There are far greater resources involved in insolvent State banks as compared with insolvent national banks.

In this connection reference is here made to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year 1931, where can be found quite a detailed statement with reference to the bank insolvencies of the past several years. For the reporting year ending in 1931 there was a total of 7,672 bank failures, of which number 1,044 were national and 6,628 were State banks, with resources of $543,800,000, and $1,300,000,000, respectively. In other words, more than two and one-half times the resources were tied up in insolvent State institutions that were in insolvent national banks.

POSSIBLE REMEDIES

The question is naturally asked as to how this unfortunate situation is to be met. Of course the positive solution would be for the legislatures of the States concerned to extend the powers and duties of the receivers of insolvent State banks. This is scarcely feasible because few of these bodies are now in session, and in West Virginia the regular session will not be convened until 1933. It may be said that a special session can be called. This course is doubtful because it is a matter of common knowledge that special sessions are restricted and generally involve some extraneous matters. Further, it would entail a cumbersome and expensive procedure.

The other course is for the organization of a liquidating corporation within the State, the capital stock of which could be subscribed by the solvent banks and individuals interested in the liquidation of the insolvent institutions. The receivers with their present powers of sale could then dispose of the assets of the insolvent banks to this liquidating corporation. The liquidating corporation in turn could then pledge these assets with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. As simple as this solution may be, such a method requires an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, for as the law is now framed no relief can be extended to an institution "for the purpose of initiating, setting on foot, or financing any enterprise that is not initiated, set on foot, or undertaken prior to the adoption to this act." This could easily be corrected by an amendment excluding from this exception a corporation engaged in the liquidation of insolvent State banking institutions.

NECESSITY FOR PROMPT CONSIDERATION

In conclusion, to relieve these insolvent State institutions and make available the benefits of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act there must be prompt action. It must be borne in mind that only $200,000,000 with the expansion, which will total $800,000,000, is available for relief to banks. Delay may mean that before the State can be placed on a footing of participation the insolvent national banks will have absorbed a large percentage of this fund. Insolvent national banks with a possible demand for $543,800,000 may leave only a small amount to bring relief to State institutions whose assets total $1,300,000,000. If the intent and purpose of this relief measure are not to be thwarted, so far as insolvent State banks are concerned, early attention to a solution of this problem is essential.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, this morning, in a public hearing before the Committee on Insular Affairs, the Hon. Patrick J. Hurley, Secretary of War, vigorously opposed the immediate or early withdrawal of our sovereignty from the Philippines, on the alleged grounds:

First. That the inhabitants are not now capable or prepared for self-government.

Second. That from an economic standpoint they are not prepared for self-government.

Third. That the political, financial, and cultural interests of the Filipinos will not be promoted by immediate or early independence.

Fourth. That many Filipino business men had informed him privately that they were opposed to immediate or early Philippine independence.

Fifth. That the Moros should not be intrusted to their traditional enemies, the Filipinos.

Sixth. That the Filipinos are incapable of defending their independence from foreign aggression.

I respect the Secretary and the great office he now occupies. I admire his great ability but regret that it should be employed in what seems to me to be an exceedingly unworthy cause. In my 10 years' experience in public life I do not recall ever having heard such an eloquent plea founded on a more selfish, sordid, and sinister philosophy. While expressing friendship and admiration for the Filipinos and conceding their right to ultimate independence, he was not willing to indicate when our guardianship over these 13,000,000 people should end and when they should be admitted to the family of self-governing commonwealths, but vehemently declared that political, financial, economic, social, and cultural chaos, confusion, and disaster would follow the withdrawal of our flag from the Philippines.

It is regrettable that this member of the President's Cabinet is so unchangeably opposed to granting independence to the Filipinos, because we are justified in assuming that he is reflecting the attitude of President Hoover and the national Republican administration. I believe the overwhelming sentiment of the American people favors immediate and complete independence of the Philippines, and the hostile attitude of the President and his official family will not prevent this Congress from granting independence to the Filipinos, who, emerging from 300 years of unspeakable oppression, now crave the poor but natural right and privilege of making and administering the laws under which they live and building a distinct culture and civilization suitable to their peculiar needs and environment.

Every argument urged by the honorable Secretary of War against immediate or early Philippine independence was with the same fervor and eloquence made in the English Parliament against granting independence to the thirteen American Colonies. The political, financial, and economic chaos which the honorable Secretary of War claims will overwhelm the Filipinos if granted independence were prophesied as sure to come to the American colonists if they retired from the protection of the British flag.

By way of parallel and illustration, I propose at this time to appeal to history to show that if the arguments the honorable Secretary of War is making against Philippine independence had been heeded during our Revolutionary period, what is now the United States of America would doubtless be thirteen English colonies or provinces. Those who prophesy that dire calamities and political, financial, and economic disaster will inevitably overwhelm the Filipinos if and when they are granted independence are as badly mistaken as were the English statesmen, who before, during, and after the American Revolution prophesied that with independence the American Colonies would face political, social, financial, and economic disaster.

We should not overlook the historic fact that during and long after the American Revolution a majority of the politicians, members of Parliament, and publicists in England sincerely believed and boldly proclaimed that a large majority of the American colonists were ignorant, untutored, and unmanageable, impatient of governmental restraint, unappreciative of law and order, and wholly incapable of self-government. There was an overwhelming sentiment in England that if the colonists succeeded in throwing off the English yoke their independence would be of short duration, and after floundering around for a few years in an unsuccessful effort to govern themselves they would confess failure and pass under the control and become dependencies of France or some other European nation. The English people miserably misjudged and underestimated the capacity of the American colonists for self-government, just as many Americans are miserably misjudging and underestimating the capacity of the Filipinos for self-government.

George III, George Grenville, Lord North, and the English Parliament contemptuously ignored petitions of the American colonists for a redress of their grievances and branded them as incompetents and incapable of administering their own affairs. Lord Macaulay said of Prime Minister Grenville that he knew of "no national interest except those that are expressed in pounds, shillings, and pence." When England reluctantly acknowledged the independence of the thirteen American Colonies a large majority of the men in public life in England unhesitatingly declared, and I think honestly believed, that the colonists, who had won their freedom at the point of the sword, were incapable of self-government, that they would not be able to efficiently administer their domestic affairs or maintain their independence against foreign aggression, and that in a few years they would dissolve their newly formed government and seek protection under the English flag.

At this time I desire to quote from speeches made in the British Parliament before, during, and after the Revolution, from which it will be conclusively shown that the overwhelming weight of sentiment among English statesmen was to the effect:

First. That the American colonists were not capable or qualified for self-government.

Second. That the great majority of colonists did not favor independence.

Third. That the movement for independence was fostered and made to order by a few scheming politicians, who did not reflect the sentiment of the majority of the people and who were actuated by essentially selfish motives and a desire to hold office and exploit the masses.

Fourth. That the rank and file of the colonists were giving the independence movement no support and were waiting for an opportune time to revolt against the new government and withdraw support from the Continental Armies. And, moreover, the colonists could not and would not fight.

Fifth. That from an economic or business standpoint the colonists could not afford to sever their political or economic ties with Great Britain.

Sixth. That the colonists, once having obtained independence, would not be able to build and maintain a stable government, or a stable economic structure, and in a few years would be compelled to renew their allegiance to the British flag or be overrun and conquered by France or some other strong and mercenary nation.

I shall quote from Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, a monumental work of such magnitude and value that if all other records of the British Parliament were destroyed it would supply an almost complete history of that historic body and show the long and tedious processes by which the free institutions of England were developed and brought to their present high state of efficiency.

Sir John Montague, fourth Earl of Sandwich, head of the British Admiralty, speaking in the English Parliament, ridiculed the colonists and scornfully referred to them in the following language:

> The noble lord mentions the impracticability of conquering America. I can not think the noble lord can be serious on this matter. Suppose the colonies do abound in men; what does that signify? They are raw, undisciplined, cowardly men. I wish instead of 40,000 or 50,000 of these brave fellows they would produce in the field at least 200,000; the more the better; the easier would be the conquest; if they did not run away they would starve themselves into compliance with our measures.

But Lord Sandwich, a rake and a roué, who had not exhausted his stock of withering contempt for the unsophisticated American colonists, continued:

> I will tell your lordships an anecdote that happened at the siege of Louisburgh. Sir Peter Warren told me that in order to try the courage of the Americans he ordered a great number of them to be placed in the front of the army. The Americans pretended at first to be very much elated at this mark of distinction, and boasted what mighty feats they would do upon the scene of action; however, when the moment came to put in execution this boasted courage, behold, every one of them ran from the front to the rear of the army with as much expedition as their feet could carry them.

Lord Sandwich's denunciation of the Americans grew in intensity, and he said:

> Sir Peter finding what egregious cowards they were, and knowing of what importance such numbers must be to intimidate the French by their appearance, told these American heroes that his orders had been misunderstood; that he always intended to keep them in the rear of the army to make the great push; that it was the custom of generals to preserve the best troops to the last; that this was always the Roman custom, and as the Americans resembled the Romans in every particular, especially in courage and love of their country, he should make no scruple of following the Roman custom, and made no doubt but the modern Romans would show acts of bravery equal to any in ancient Rome. By such discourses as these Sir Peter made a shift to keep the Americans with him, though he took good care they should be pushed forward in no dangerous conflict.

And then the noble earl delivered the following scorching broadside:

> Now I can tell the noble lord that this is exactly the situation of all the heroes in North America; they are all Romans; and are these the men to fright us from the post of honor? Believe me, my lords, the very sound of a cannon would carry them off, in Sir Peter's words, as fast as their feet could carry them. This is too trifling a part of the argument to detain your lordships any longer.

The noble earl continued to abuse the Americans for not paying their debts; he made no doubt that the real motive of their associations was to defraud their creditors. That the Continental Congress was a seditious and treasonable meeting of persons assembled to resist the legal and just authority of the supreme legislative power.

In this manner the lord of the British Admiralty—who, by the way, made the first sandwich—expressed the prevailing opinion in England as to the alleged pusillanimity of the men who won our liberties at the point of anvil-forged swords and bayonets.

Captain Phipps, on April 19, 1774, in a debate for the repeal of the duty on tea, said:

> I perfectly agree that the Americans can not resist, and that the doctrine of supremacy is good.

Mr. Rigby, on May 2, 1774, in discussing the bill for regulating the government of Massachusetts Bay, said:

> America, at this instant, is in a state of downright anarchy.

Lord George Germain, on May 2, 1774, in debating a bill for regulating the government of Massachusetts Bay, said:

> America, at this instant, is nothing but anarchy and confusion. Have they any one measure but what depends upon the will of the lawless multitude? Where are the courts of justice? Shut up. Where are your judges? One of them taking refuge in your court. Where are your council? Where is your governor? All of them intimidated by a lawless rabble. * * * I can not help once more condemning that mob of people which, under the profession of liberty, carries dark designs in its execution.

In the course of parliamentary debate, it was stated that in a letter written from Williamsburg, December 24, 1774, to the Earl of Dartmouth, Lord Dunmore, English Governor of Virginia, referred to the colonists as—

> An outrageous and lawless mob; * * * that the lower class of people will discover that they have been duped by the richer sort; * * * that the resistance would result in quarrels and dissensions among the colonists * * * and I have persuaded that the colony, even by their own acts and deeds, must be brought to see the necessity of depending on its mother country and of embracing its authority.

In discussing the Boston port bill in 1774, Colonel Barre, a friend of the American colonists, said:

> I have not a doubt but a very small part of our strength will at any time overpower them [meaning the American colonists].

Captain Phipps in a debate on a motion to repeal the duty on tea said:

> I perfectly agree that the Americans can not resist.

Captain Luttrell on March 23, 1775, speaking in the Commons on the petitions for reconciliation with America said:

> Sir, that the Colonies are inseparably united to the Imperial Crown of this realm I trust will never be denied by the friends of either clime; but, though it has been asserted America can subsist without our commerce, I believe nobody will say she can flourish without our protection. If we abandon her to her present miserable situation, she must soon sue to us or to some power for succor. In securing their lives and properties, the Americans must ere long experience the fatal consequences of being exposed to the depredations of marauders and lawless ruffians; they will soon cry aloud for the reestablishment of those judicial authorities that have been imprudently overturned and which are necessary, not only to the welfare but the very existence of the subject among the rudest nations of the globe. Sir, I fear, indeed, the Americans at this hour can not properly be styled the most civilized people in the known world, but an unfortunate fatality seems to have awaited that unhappy country for a series of years past.

How similar the foregoing arguments to those we now hear in opposition to liberating the Filipinos. Listen to the voice of England 157 years ago:

> America can subsist without English commerce, but nobody will say she can flourish without our protection. If we abandon her to her present miserable situation, she must soon sue to us or to some power for succor—

And so forth.

Now let us paraphrase this language and apply it to the Philippine situation:

> The Filipinos can subsist without American commerce, but nobody will say she can flourish without American protection. If we abandon the Philippines in their present helpless situation, they will be compelled soon to sue to us or to some power for succor. In securing independence the Filipinos must ere long experience the fatal consequences of being exposed to the depredations of marauders and lawless ruffians, or of being seized by Japan; they will soon cry aloud for the reestablishment of the political and economic relations severed by the granting of independence.

In other words, the threadbare arguments made now against Filipino independence are the same arguments that were made 157 years ago by our English masters against granting independence to the thirteen American Colonies. These arguments were fallacious then when invoked against our Revolutionary fathers, and they are fallacious now when invoked against Filipino independence.

Mr. St. John, on May 2, 1774, in debate said:

It is not, sir, the strength of America that we dread; they have neither men, army, nor navy. What, then, have we to fear? Do we dread the loss of our trade? No, sir; the avarice of the Americans will prevent that. They threaten us with not paying their debts, but I am afraid if we give way to them they will not allow that they owe us any.

In 1782 the Earl of Shelburne said:

With respect to America, he has always considered her independence as a great evil which we had to dread and to guard against. He had spoken of it in this manner for years past, and when he believed he was joined in sentiment by every man in this country. He had always believed and declared that the independence of America was an evil as much to be apprehended and dreaded by America as by Britain. This had always been his opinion, and he had constantly labored, by every means in his power, to persuade men that this was the case in his applications to private men and to public men, to individuals and to bodies of men; he had always held the doctrine that the independence of America was an evil to be equally guarded against by both countries. He wished to God that he had been appointed to urge that proposition and to maintain it before Congress. He wished to God that he had been called to prove by argument the assertion that the independence of America must be as prejudicial to herself as to Britain. He would have gone much greater lengths and said much more at the bar of Congress than he ever said in his place in the British Parliament—

And so forth.

In order to keep the thirteen Colonies under the British flag the learned statesmen of England solemnly declared that independence would be a very bad thing for the Americans, both from an economic and political standpoint, just as the opponents of Filipino independence now argue that independence will be a calamity to the Filipinos. There was no basis for this apprehension when invoked against the Colonies in Revolutionary times, nor is there any basis for the contention that political and economic disaster will engulf the Filipinos if we withdraw our sovereignty.

On May 2, 1774, in debate on a bill for regulating the government of Massachusetts Bay, Mr. Stanley said:

These bills certainly affect the interior policy of America and are intended for the better regulation of its internal government. Whatever may be the opinion of the propriety of regulation with the Americans I know not, but their submission to the laws of some country is necessary, as I can not conceive the independence of an American colony to exist whilst the balance of power remains in Europe, supported and protected by armies and navies. These people must resort to some state, and it must be a Protestant one, and were they to unite themselves with any other state than this they would meet with a yoke and burden which they would not wish to bear. It is said by some that this is driving them to a state of slavery; by others that this proceeding will be ineffectual. As to the latter, if we do not go far enough we are certainly on the right side; but I can not sit still and see with indifference the authority of this country submitting to every indignity they shall offer us. There are but two ways of governing mankind—by force or by consent.

Lord Mansfield in the course of debate referred to the American patriots in Boston and New England as "fanatics."

Mr. Lyttelton (afterwards Lord Westcote) in debate, while conceding the northern Colonies were capable of offering considerable resistance, said:

The southern Colonies are weak on account of the number of negroes in them, and I am of the opinion that if a few regiments are sent there, the negroes will rise in revolt and imbrue their hands in the blood of their masters.

Earl Gower on January 20, 1775, in debate on Lord Chatham's motion to withdraw troops from Boston, said that:

The rank now held by the Americans was the rank of the rabble and a few factious leaders; that the delegates and the Congress were far from expressing the true sense of the respectable part of their constituents; that in many places they were chosen by a kind of force in which the people of consequence were afraid, unprotected as they were, to interpose; and where it was otherwise they were borne down by a faction in some instances and perverted by the most false misrepresentation in others.

Colonel Grant on February 2, 1775, in debating an address to the King upon the disturbances in North America, said he had—served in America and knew the Americans well; was certain they would not fight. They would never dare to face an English army, and did not possess any of the qualifications necessary to make a good soldier.

He repeated many of their commonplace expressions, ridiculed their enthusiasm in matters of religion, and drew a disagreeable picture of their manners and ways of living.

In 1778 Mr. Johnstone, referring to the thirteen Colonies, said:

The Congress seem to conduct themselves with the low cunning of an election jobber; their proceedings are often calculated for the herd of the people who are yet strangers to the impositions incident to such ascendancy.

Continuing, he said:

I firmly believe two-thirds of the people of North America wish to return to their ancient connection with Great Britain, and that nothing but a surrounding army and the diffidence they have in our support, prevents that spirit from breaking out in acts of hostility against Congress.

Charles the Bold lost his dukedom and life in a war against a feeble people, whom he contemptuously denominated "a deluded multitude of Swiss." England, in like manner, lost the fairest and richest of her colonial possessions, because she looked upon our appeal for independence with contemptuous indifference.

In 1779, in discussing the conduct of the war in America, Mr. Rigby said:

General Burgoyne at Saratoga calmly stacked 5,000 English rifles and surrendered his magnificent army of English soldiers to a rabble or an undisciplined militia.

William Eden (afterwards Lord Auckland), who had been a member of a commission appointed by the English Government to visit America and endeavor to reach an agreement with the colonists, in discussing the offers made the colonists, said, on June 3, 1779:

We offered:

(1) To consent to a cessation of hostilities both by sea and land.

(2) To restore free intercourse, to revive mutual affection, and renew the common benefits of naturalization throughout the several parts of the Empire.

(3) To agree that no military forces should be kept up in the different States of North America without the consent of the General Congress or particular assemblies. These offers, I allow, were absolute and positive. The first and second must, of course, have been the best and immediate consequences of peace, and if there is any doubt as to the last I can only say that I do not see the objection; it implied in our minds, and in every man's mind, that the King would retain the supreme command of the military force, whatever it might be, and the nomination of all officers. And it must be for the safety and interest of each Colony to have a force adequate to its own relative situation in this Empire.

Continuing, Mr. Eden said:

We also offered:

(1) To extend every freedom of trade that our respective interests can require.

(2) To concur in measures calculated to discharge the debts of America and to raise the credit and value of the paper circulation.

(3) To perpetuate our union by a reciprocal deputation of an agent or agents for the different states, who shall have the privilege of a seat and voice in the Parliament of Great Britain, or if sent from Britain, in that case to have a seat in the assemblies of the different states which may be sent, in order to attend to the several interests of those by whom they are deputed. * * * And lastly, we offered to establish the power of the respective legislature in each particular state, to settle its revenues, its civil and military establishments, and to exercise a perfect freedom of legislation and internal government, so that the British states throughout North America, acting with us in peace and war, under one common sovereign, may have the irrevocable enjoyment of every privilege that is short of total separation of interests, or consistent with that union of force on which the safety of our common religion and liberty depends.

Mr. Eden epitomized the offer of England to the Colonies as follows:

We desire you to be our brothers under one father; we claim not pretensions from our eldership; we expect no inequality; we insist only on having one king, one friend, and one enemy, a free union of force and friendship.

"What was their answer," said Mr. Eden—

We will have a total and eternal separation from you.

Thus the American colonists scornfully rejected the offer of Great Britain to grant them a but slightly restricted or limited independence.

It will be observed that England offered our forefathers a greater degree of self-government than we have granted the Philippines, and yet these proposals for conciliation were rejected by the colonists because they fell a little short of absolute independence. We can not consistently ask the Filipino to accept a scheme for partial self-government like the one our forefathers indignantly spurned.

Lord George Germain, one of the most inveterate enemies of the Colonies, as late as June 3, 1779, after the English peace commission had failed, said:

I have often asserted, and I renew the assertion, that the majority of the people of America are with us. As a proof of this, we have large corps of provincials in arms in our favor, and I have this day received a letter from Governor Tryon, in which he assured me that we had now 7,000 American seamen employed in our privateers. It is the Congress only that opposed a reunion with this country, and even the Congress is far from being of one opinion on the subject.

And again, in describing the Members of the American Congress, he said:

The most violent of the Americans chose the most violent among themselves to represent them in Congress.

The American colonists were not content to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the English Government, and we can not expect the Filipino people to be insensible to the impulses and ambitions which actuated our Revolutionary fathers in their historic struggle for independence.

In every age of the world's history races have been enslaved and nations held in bondage on the specious plea that they were not capable of self-government, or that a better government could be supplied by their alien masters. Athens, the birthplace of democracy, even in the Golden Age of Pericles, had only about 30,000 free citizens. She allowed only an insignificant part of her population to participate in the enactment and administration of her laws, and she ruled her provinces and subject cities with unbridled despotism, claiming that the masses were unworthy and incapable of having a part in governmental affairs.

The American people are face to face with an issue that can not be side-stepped, and the solution of which will test their mettle and convincingly demonstrate their unselfish devotion to the principles around which their benign scheme of government is built. We will convict ourselves of embarrassing inconsistency if while enjoying the blessings of self-government we deny these God-given rights to others. Thirteen million Filipinos who came under our control by the fortunes of war have demonstrated by 30 years' successful administration of their own domestic affairs ample capacity to take over all the functions of government, including supervision of their international relations.

In the annals of the world there is no instance where, in the brief span of 30 years, another race has made more rapid progress in civic, social, cultural, and political affairs or in the practical and efficient application of wholesome and helpful principles of government. It is a source of lasting satisfaction that the Filipino is forward-looking and progressive in conceptions of government. The victim of centuries of exploitation and oppression, he can not look with tolerance on any form of government that limits the natural rights of man or deprives him of personal or political freedom. In his heart of hearts he abhors not only monarchical forms of government but bureaucratic or provincial systems by which a republic sometimes endeavors to rule and exploit a subject race or dependency.

In other words, the Filipino is in step with the enlightened nations of the world that have representative forms of government, and being essentially democratic in his conceptions of the rights of the citizen and the functions, purposes, and powers of the state, he craves the privilege of building a Filipino republic, using our free institutions as a pattern, to the end that the 13,000,000 Filipinos and their posterity may have a freedom comparable with our own. By no manner or means can this inherent, militant, motivating impulse and purpose be suppressed. Tyrants, in their passion for power and in their withering contempt for the natural rights of subject or citizen, have never yet been able to forge a chain that can shackle the human mind or grappling hooks sufficiently powerful to uproot the longing for liberty that a beneficent Providence has anchored immovably in every human soul. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say for the information of the Members that while we will take up the so-called "lame-duck" resolution on Friday of this week, there will be no vote on it until Saturday afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman be willing to let the vote go over until Monday? There are a great many Members on this side who have made arrangements to be away on Friday and Saturday. They took it for granted that perhaps Saturday would be a holiday and that on Lincoln's birthday there would not be very important matters considered in the House.

Mr. RAINEY. I see no objection to that. We can vote on it Monday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to prefer a unanimous-consent request to that effect? A parliamentary situation might develop where it would be difficult to carry it over until Monday. Monday is unanimous-consent day as well as suspension day, but the House can take the vote at a later time by unanimous consent.

Mr. SNELL. May it not go over until Tuesday, then?

The SPEAKER. When the consideration of the resolution is completed and the resolution is reported to the House, the House could now agree by unanimous consent to take the vote at any future date.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of the so-called "lame-duck" resolution, the vote on the passage of the resolution may be postponed until Tuesday of next week.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would it be possible to start consideration of the bill on Saturday instead of on Friday?

Mr. RAINEY. No, sir. That would not be possible.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION AND THE ANTITRUST LAWS

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement made by me before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate opposing the confirmation of Mr. William E. Humphrey as a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am appearing this morning against the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey because of his activities in establishing and promoting these trade-practice conferences.

I want to say that in establishing these trade-practice conferences by the Federal Trade Commission for the various industries of the country, wherein the commission indorses trade-practice rules for the industries, that the commission has done more to help industry defeat the antitrust laws than anything that has happened since the passage of the act. Under a resolution passed by the Senate about one year ago the Federal Trade Commission has been holding investigations of the cottonseed oil-mill industry, so as to ascertain whether or not this industry has been able to form a trust, fix prices, etc. A report should be forthcoming from the commission at a very early date, which I am sure will show that what I have to say here this morning is absolutely true.

I used to be a general supply merchant, doing a very large business. I bought and sold thousands of bales of cotton and thousands of carloads of cottonseed. I bought as an independent buyer, always giving the top prices for cotton and cottonseed—not a price to make money in buying seed, but in the interest of making a real market in the interest of my business. At that time I could go to the telephone and call a half dozen cottonseed-oil mills and offer seed for sale and always get competitive bids and then sell to the highest bidder. Since the trade-practice conference for the cottonseed-oil mills by the commission independent buying and selling of seed is practically a thing of the past. I have hundreds of letters from cottonseed buyers, some of them having bought seed for the past 20 years as independent buyers, who have been absolutely put out of the market since the trade-practice conference that was held in 1928.

I want to quote from Mr. Christie Benet's statement made at the opening of the Cottonseed Trade Practice Conference, which will fully explain why a conference:

"It is not necessary at this time to go into a detailed statement of the competitive set-up in the industry. We have known about this competitive set-up for years, but did not see our way out."

Mr. Benet is one of the best lawyers in my district and represents the Cottonseed Oil Products Association, composed of practically all oil mills, refineries, and chemists who analyze cottonseed as members thereof.

Mr. Benet could have extended his speech, and perhaps did, as follows:

"Gentlemen of the conference, as you know, in the past as an industry we have had numbers of independent mills that did not go into our associations but persisted in buying seed and making their own prices, which brought about competition which was extended to the buyers of cottonseed from farmers. Therefore, not being able to control these independent mills and independent buyers, we have had hard sailing in fixing and controlling prices."

No doubt he stated that this could be done only by buying up or forcing these independent mills to enter into set rules and trade practices and have all mills sign on the dotted line.

Now, gentlemen, I not only make the charge that competition between the mills in buying and selling cottonseed and their products, which would mean a healthy competition on the farmer's market of the South, is a thing of the past, but that since the trade-practice conference at Memphis in 1928 the industry has enjoyed a "hog-tied" monopoly, weeding out independent mills and independent cottonseed buyers, thereby fixing prices and robbing farmers and cottonseed buyers out of millions of dollars annually. In making these charges, I seem to have the backing of the South Carolina Legislature in the passage of a resolution wherein they make the same charges that I do and have authorized the attorney general to make investigations and prosecute the cotton mills doing business in South Carolina in violation of the anti-trust laws.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED BY LEGISLATURE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

"Whereas the sovereign State owes a solemn obligation to its farmers and planters to protect them from the high-handed and nefarious treatment which for some time has been and is now being measured out to them by the cottonseed-oil manufacturers, in that the universal price offered by the manufacturers for prime cottonseed, February 1, was the measly sum of $26 per ton, which cottonseed, when manufactured into cottonseed products, is sold based on mill prices of same date for a minimum of approximately $44 per ton, a difference or gross profit to cottonseed oil manufactured of not less than $18 per ton; and

"Whereas there exists and persists a very apparent oneness in agreement and action between mills to maintain this profit, regardless of market fluctuations and varying grades of seed; and

"Whereas it is a well-known and established fact that 1 ton of prime cottonseed manufactured by an average or ordinary oil mill will produce the following products, which were quoted February 1, f. o. b. mills, at—

950 pounds cottonseed meal, at $32 per ton	$15.20
340 pounds cottonseed oil, at 0.07¼ per pound	23.80
550 pounds cottonseed hulls, at 0.45 per hundredweight	2.48
75 pounds linters, at 0.03½ per pound	2.62
85 pounds loss due to trash and moisture.
2,000 pounds	44.10

and

"Whereas the sacks and tags for the meal cost $1 for each ton of cottonseed worked, and the average freight charges on cottonseed from shipping points to cottonseed-oil manufacturing plants amount to $1.50 per ton, with no transportation charge on the large amount of cottonseed hauled by farmers and planters on wagons and trucks directly to the manufacturing plants; and

"Whereas it can be established beyond question that $5 per ton is a reasonable manufacturing charge or cost, which, when added to the cost of the meal sacks and tags ($1) and freight charges ($1.50) herein mentioned, makes a total of $7.50 per ton, which, deducted from the spread of $18 per ton between the carlot market price for cottonseed and the manufactured cottonseed products, leaves a net profit to the cottonseed-oil manufacturers of $10.50 per ton; and

"Whereas such profit is exorbitant, indefensible, confiscatory, and should not be tolerated, and is being maintained to the farmers' detriment and ruin only through a South-wide organization of the manufacturers, who, having a highly paid legal counsel and organizer, are evidently hoodwinging the Federal Trade Commission; and

"Whereas South Carolina farmers and planters annually produce approximately 300,000 tons of cottonseed on which, based on the figures named, they are losing, notwithstanding their poverty, approximately $3,000,000 annually; and,

"Whereas it would be manifestly stupid for this general assembly, a part of whom have already expressed concern for the oppressed farmer and taxpayer in a comparative gesture, to pass unnoticed and unremedied the action of this gigantic combination which is unjustly and illegally extracting from the pockets of the farmers of South Carolina, alone, an annual sum equal to more than the entire income from the 5-mill property levy; Now therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the attorney general is hereby instructed to confer immediately with the Attorney General of the United States, the Federal Trade Commission, and such other State and Federal authorities as he may be advised and to take vigorous steps in conjunction with the Federal Government and/or other States and/or alone to immediately correct the abuses mentioned and to punish those responsible for them if such course is practicable and to regulate or put an end to this manifestly unjust combine of the cottonseed oil mills of this and other States, and to make to this general assembly a progress report of his actions by March 15, 1930, and to make a full report of his acts, doings, and accomplishments to the next general assembly, together with such recommendation as he may deem proper."

My charges are further borne out by a recent unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama in the case of Dothan Oil Mill Co. et al. v. Espy et al. (127 Southern Reporter, 179). In that case Mr. Espy and others obtained an injunction against the Dothan Oil Mill Co. and other oil mills from Alabama from putting into effect the agreements entered into at Memphis, Tenn., which had for their purpose the setting of prices of cottonseed and destroying competition in the purchase and sale of cottonseed. I quote from their decision:

"We have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the defendants have entered into a combine, pool, trust, or confederation to regulate or fix prices of cottonseed in this State and are attempting to destroy competition in the sale thereof in violation of the State antitrust laws."

Senator NEELY (interposing). What are you reading from?

Representative FULMER. This is a decree or the findings of the Supreme Court of Alabama in a case against the Dothan Oil Mill Co.

The CHAIRMAN. What court?

Representative FULMER. The State Supreme Court of Alabama.

In the meantime I am prepared to prove these charges not from statements issued by the industry or from the Federal Trade Commission, said commission being a party to the crime, but by written facts and figures from farmers, bankers, merchants, and cottonseed buyers; also by actual invoices and analysis of cottonseed issued by the mills to the buyers.

During March I mailed out a number of questionnaires to independent and commission cottonseed buyers in my district. Perhaps the largest file in my office contains replies and letters from seed buyers, bankers, and merchants from my State showing that they are very much interested in this matter, and what applies to South Carolina will also apply to all of the cotton States.

I had a trip to my State during March and found that commission buyers were willing and anxious to tell me about the deplorable condition existing on the seed market since the trade-practice conference and also how the independent buyers were being put out of the market and forced to sign uniform commissioned buyers' contract. They did not want to do much writing, because they knew that it would mean the canceling of their contract next fall. I shall be unable to place into the RECORD all replies to these questionnaires or letters received, but I am going to give you a fair sample of them.

This party lives in my home county and is one of the best business men and farmers in the county.

I quote from the questionnaire:

"Please answer the following questions and return to me. I will not use your name if you do not want me to.

"Do you buy cottonseed independently or under contract? Answer. Contract.

"Have you ever bought independently? Yes.

"As an independent buyer, did you sell for the highest offer? Yes.

"Under your present contract, do you sell to one mill? Yes.

"How many independent buyers in your town? None.

"Does your contract forbid you dividing your commission? Yes.

"Did you find all mills had the same price during the past season? Yes.

"I understand seed that you buy as wagon seed is not graded. Is this true? Yes.

"I understand all seed shipped in car lots independently are graded. Is this true? Yes.

"It is my understanding that this is the method used by the mills to put independent buyers out of the market by grading their seed down from basis price. Am I right? Yes.

"Do you operate a cotton gin? No.

"Do you owe a cottonseed-oil mill for borrowed money? No.

"Do you agree with what I say in my speech of February 14? Yes.

(Signed) ——— ———."

Listen to this letter written by the same party:

"DEAR MR. FULMER: Your communication of March 15 has been received, and I heartily agree in what you say about the conduct of the cottonseed-oil mills. The organization or combine of these mills has completely eliminated the independent cottonseed buyer in that he will be unable to secure bids sufficient to let him out without losses. The grading down by the mills of independent car-lot seed will ruin any man of small means who undertakes to operate as an independent buyer.

"For the past 25 years I have been connected in one form or another with the purchase of cottonseed, mostly as an independent buyer, but the past season the handwriting on the wall was so plain I found it necessary to buy only on contract for the mills and could not from time to time secure bids from other mills that were any advantage over the mill for which I was buying under contract. I might say, for your information, that no funds belonging to any mill were used by me in the purchase of cottonseed. While my contract called for the use of their funds, my own were used for the purpose of taking advantage of higher prices from other mills, but the same did not materialize.

"I might also add that the prices paid for seed during the past season were not in proportion to prices of former years based on the quotation of cottonseed oil, but run as a general thing from $5 to $10 per ton less. I want to congratulate you on the efforts being made to disturb this organization and wish to assure you of my cooperation and assistance.

"Sincerely yours."

To this question: "Do you owe a cottonseed oil mill borrowed money on your cotton-gin plant?" I have quite a number of answers, "Yes."

These fellows by virtue of these loans are hog-tied in a contract to deliver all seed bought at their cotton gins to the mills loaning the money. It is needless for them to be concerned about a competitive market or a fair price for cottonseed. They simply buy as instructed and receive as commission $3 per ton.

These buyers requested me not to use their names, as they realize that the mills would cancel their loans. The practice of owning outright and loaning money on gin plants by cottonseed-oil mills is growing by leaps and bounds. This is one of the sure ways of absolutely controlling the cottonseed market.

I quote from a statement issued by Mr. Smoak, of my district:

MR. SMOAK'S STATEMENT

"He who 'spake as never man spake' declared that 'the laborer is worthy of his hire,' but the Southern Cotton Oil Co. says, 'Nay; not so,' to the ginners of Calhoun County.

"For apparently personal and selfish reasons the Southern Cotton Oil Co. of this place has seen fit to attempt to monopolize the ginning and seed business and drive legitimate competition to the wall by cutting the price of ginning at St. Matthews below the cost of operating, while holding the price up to the level in the sister town of Orangeburg and all other points.

"This $10,000,000 corporation, composed of New York and New Orleans millionaires, have declared that they intend to drive us out of business for no other offense than that we have stood by our friends to the limit of our resources and have given to the extent of our ability to help them in every reasonable way by extending them every courtesy and accommodation within our power.

"We raise no cry of persecution, the facts speak for themselves; and we now feel justified in requesting our friends to aid in staying the tentacles of this giant octopus, whose sole desire seems to be to strangle logical competition.

"We commenced no fight on the Southern Cotton Oil Co., and will never do so. We wish them well in every legal and ethical business method, and are surely entitled to the same consideration. We know, and the Southern Cotton Oil Co. ought to know, that honest differences of opinion can only be properly adjusted by mutual conformity to the golden rule and not by fighting. If they have a reasonable grievance against our operating methods, why should they hesitate to manfully declare it? We and the public would welcome such criticism.

"We consider the price of $3.25 per bale for ginning, bagging, and ties a very fair one to the farmer and the ginner; one which allows a living to both. When a farmer goes to the gin he not only expects but is entitled to have his cotton properly ginned, and I venture the assertion that there is not a farmer in Calhoun County so selfish as not to be willing to pay the ginner a fair price that will allow him to live and maintain his equipment in proper operating condition.

"This price of $3.25 per bale is about 75 cents less than the prevailing price throughout South Carolina, but we adopted it in the beginning of the season as a fair one and will continue to stand by it. It has been violated, and the public knows the reason why.

"The Southern Cotton Oil Co. will hardly venture to candidly inform the community of its reason or excuse for this gratuitous and unwarranted war on lawful business methods. If you have a valid price-cutting reason against the writer or other ginners of Calhoun County that will bear the light, speak out, gentlemen, and declare the 'truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.'

"We can not contend alone against this gigantic monopoly in its present price-cutting policy and are calling upon our farmer friends of Calhoun County to continue their support if our services to you have been satisfactory, which we always endeavor to make them. We are only the first victim of this unholy war. If they succeed in cutting our throats, the knife will in due season be applied to yours. If we do not 'hang together now' for lawful and just business methods, we will all be 'hanged separately later.'

"A. S. SMOAK GINNERY."

Prior to the trade practice conference we had no grading of cottonseed except perhaps if we had a very wet season, which would sometimes cause seed to damage. In a case like this a seed buyer representing the oil mill would come to your seed warehouse, examine the seed by cutting and counting the damaged seed, and make you a bona fide price. You would know just what price you would receive for your seed. Since the conference they refuse to examine your seed until shipped in, if you were an independent seed buyer. In the case of a commission buyer, buying for instance, in the same town with the independent buyer, the mills do not grade the commission buyer's seed.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand you to say that the Federal Trade Commission fixed this?

Representative FULMER. This is the outcome of the trade practice conference. Certain large mills claimed that it was bad business practice to buy seed not graded, but I am prepared to prove to you that it was a scheme to put the independent buyer out, because they did not grade the seed shipped in by their commission buyers. The mills paid the same basis price to both commission buyers and independent buyers, but I will show you in a few minutes what they did to the independent buyer in grading down his seed from basic price.

These industries over the country are so satisfied with the indorsement of the Federal Trade Commission in these trade practice conferences that they have a bill now pending before the Senate to make these trade practice conferences legal, as well as legislation for grading cottonseed.

Senator SMITH. When was this grading process started?

Representative FULMER. It was put into effect shortly after the trade practice conference in 1928.

Senator DILL. I want to get clear before the committee what relation the decision of the Alabama Supreme Court has to the Federal Trade Commission.

Representative FULMER. I quoted the decision of this court to further prove my contention that the industry is operating a trust. I contend that the indorsement of the Federal Trade Commission of these trade practice rules and what they call a code of ethics in doing business simply placed the industry in a position to get together and fix prices both on what they buy and what they sell——

Senator DILL (interposing). I am now talking about the Federal statute.

Senator WHEELER. And he is not attempting to say that.

Senator DILL. I want to get his idea of the relationship of a Federal statute to that decision by the Alabama Supreme Court. It is the Federal statute that the Federal Trade Commission is working under.

Representative FULMER. You are correct, but this decision simply confirms my contention.

Senator DILL. But that decision is not the Supreme Court of the United States decision.

Representative FULMER. No; the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama.

Senator WHEELER. It does not make any difference whether the Supreme Court of the United States or the Supreme Court of Alabama. What you are contending is that this group is violating the antitrust law of the State of Alabama, and you contend that thereby they are violating the Sherman antitrust law.

Representative FULMER. Yes; as is shown by this decree.

Senator WHEELER. I assume the antitrust law of the State of Alabama is similar to the Sherman antitrust law.

Representative FULMER. That is right.

Senator CONNALLY. In answer to Senator DILL's question, the point that you make in reference to Federal jurisdiction and State jurisdiction, as I understand the situation, the Congressman is claiming that under the Alabama laws, while the act complained of would be unlawful under those laws, in violation of the antitrust law, yet the contention is that through the action of the Federal Trade Commission what would otherwise be unlawful acts are given the color of innocence and legality by reason of having followed the suggestions of the Federal Trade Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give the committee any reference—and I think this would be the appropriate time—as to when the Federal Trade Commission took this action?

Representative FULMER. In the year 1928.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give any specific time or record of where that action appears?

Representative FULMER. Yes, sir; in the minutes of the Federal Trade Commission, of this trade-practice conference. And may I state that the commissioner who presided at the cottonseed conference, as will be shown by the minutes, made this statement: "Now, gentlemen, each of you can do these things individually, but you can not do it collectively; if you do, you will get yourselves into trouble."

I want to say to you that in the trade-practice conferences with these various industries the presiding commissioner gave every possible advice how to formulate trade-practice rules and codes of ethics, whereby the industry could defeat the antitrust laws, and then the Federal Trade Commission indorsed these.

Senator WHEELER. What they were trying to show them was how to get around the Sherman antitrust law.

Representative FULMER. Absolutely. I want to say to you gentlemen of the committee, after receiving the indorsement of the commission, that they have gone back home and put these rules and code of ethics into practice very efficiently, whereby they have robbed the cottonseed people.

The CHAIRMAN. What particular commissioner made the statement that you refer to?

Representative FULMER. Commissioner McCulloch.

Senator WATSON. Mr. Humphrey did not do all this by himself?

Representative FULMER. That is correct.

Senator NEELY. Do you know whether Mr. Humphrey participated in that meeting of which a minute was made?

Representative FULMER. Not at that particular time. I am going to insert at this point actual invoices and certificates of analyses of two cars of seed shipped by an independent buyer. I am going to leave out the name of the bill and shipper but I have the original invoices in my files.

"SOUTH CAROLINA, February 17, 1930.

"A South Carolina mill; returns for car cottonseed, from John Doe; station, Batesville, S. C.

"Stored in bin No. 3; C. W. No. 2438; car initial and number N. B. C. 78934."

	Pounds
Gross weight	73,300
Tare	41,000
Net	32,300
32,300 pounds net, at $21.81	$352.23

The above net weight of 32,300 pounds, at $30 per ton, the basis price, would have amounted to $484.50; therefore, a loss on this car to the independent shipper of $132.27 on account of undergrading.

You will note that the second car was shipped just about three days later than the first from the same point and by the same shipper. These cars contained the same quality of seed; in fact, I am informed that both cars were loaded out of the same warehouse. The seed in the first car was graded down $6.30 per ton, while the second car was graded down $8.19, making a difference of $1.81 per ton for the same seed. The basis price for both of these cars was $30 per ton. You will note from the prices received according to the outturns of the two invoices this shipper had a loss on these two cars from the basis price of $132.27 and $157.65, respectively, or a total of $289.92. In the meantime, my friends, commission buyers located at the same point, shipping the same quality of seed at the same time, received the full $30 basis price, which included their commission of $3, without any grading of their seed; therefore, without losing the $289.92, as in the case of the independent buyer. This independent buyer paid the same price to the farmer as did the commission buyer, namely, $27 per ton, which was the wagon price. Therefore, not only did he lose his profit of $3 per ton but the difference between wagon price, $27, and the net amount received; that is, $21.81 and $23.70, amounting to $289.92 of actual cash out of his pocket. How long could you expect an independent buyer to stay in the market under this grading scheme?

I want to quote from some letters so as to show you gentlemen just how the farmers and seed buyers feel about what I am complaining of.

I WISH I COULD TALK WITH YOU PERSONALLY

"MY DEAR MR. FULMER: I wish to congratulate you on your efforts to help the farmers of the country in the matter of the cottonseed situation. I wish that I could talk with you personally so that I might give you some of my experience. I will thank you, however, not to use my name as it may seriously affect the loan that one of the oil mills now has on my gin plant.

"Assuring you of my pleasure in assisting you in any way that I can and with kind personal regards, I am,

"Yours very truly,

——— ———."

HOW IS THIS?

"There is absolutely no competition in the seed market now. The mills pay you what they please for cottonseed and charge you what they damn please for the products thereof. The oil mills have everything their own way and have the farmers hog tied. I am delighted that you are going to hold an investigation and hope that you will be able to break up this trust."

A LARGE INDEPENDENT BUYER

"Mills are combined and cutting out competition without any fluctuation in the price of oil or by-products. They have reduced the price of seed and all mills have identical prices. They give notice prior to reduction in price so as to stimulate the sale of seed. I tried to get several mills to send representatives to take samples of my seed and make me an offer on them, but they claimed that this would be a violation of their agreement with the Crushers' Association. Is there no remedy for this?"

IT WON'T BE LONG BEFORE WE WILL HAVE TO SIGN A CONTRACT

"MY DEAR MR. FULMER: We have been buying seed independently for the past 15 years, also plant around 500 acres of cotton; hence, are in a position to fully realize what we are up against under the present conditions."

"It seems to us that the mills are about to succeed in eliminating the independent seed buyers. We had 400 tons of seed in our warehouse around January 1. Heretofore we have been having representatives of the various mills to call on us with the view of trying to buy our seed. We made an effort, since January, to dispose of these seed.

"We tried every mill that we could think of, with the result that every one made us the same offer, subject to the grading rules. We tried to get the different mills to send one of their representatives here to get a true sample and have them analyzed in order that they could buy the seed at a flat price. They refused, advising that they would only buy at the prevailing price then quoted for prime seed subject to the grading rules. We finally succeeded in getting a mill to buy these seed at a flat price of $23.

"For your further information, we might also state that we could not get an offer from the mills on a parity with the men that were on contract. We tried to sell our seed to a contract man in a near-by town. He only offered us $23, and yet paid another man that had some seed stored with us in the same house, on the same pile, and the same quality of seed a price of $25. This particular man knew that they were the same seed. We also tried before this to sell these seed to some of the men here that were under contract, since it was evident to us that we could not sell them as advantageously as the contract man. We being independent buyers, it seemed that the mills that had men on contract here did not want to buy our seed, for the reason when their men would call them up they would want to know if the seed being offered belonged to John Doe. They had not seen our seed nor had them analyzed to know just what condition they were in. We sold our seed last year at a price of $43.75, compared with $23 this year, and we do not think they were any worse this year than last.

"Unless conditions are remedied, it looks to us as if we will be forced to enter into a contract with some mill. We trust that you will be able to help us out in this matter.

"Yours very truly,

"_____ _____."

The trouble with this whole matter is that we have three large industries who are trying to force the independent mills into a monopoly or a trust, namely, Procter & Gamble, of Cincinnati, who own the Buckeye Cottonseed Oil Mills; Swift & Co., meat packers, of Chicago, who own the Swift Cottonseed Oil Mills; and the Southern Cottonseed Oil Co., owners of cottonseed oil mills scattered over the South. These concerns operate refineries and are not only able to fix the price of cottonseed oil produced at their crushing mills, but fix the price of cottonseed oil for sale by independent cottonseed-oil mills. Independent cottonseed-oil mills in the various localities of the cotton States buy their supplies of cottonseed from farmers in these various sections as well as sell to them the manufactured products of their mills. Lots of the seed are trucked in and manufactured products trucked out from the mills, which enables these independent mills to pay a higher price for seed as well as sell their products at a lower price than the large mills, who usually have to ship their seed and products from State to State. The real fight is on the part of these large operators trying to control the independent mills in fixing prices.

The investigation referred to a few minutes ago will actually show you that these three large industries went so far as to have surveys made of all the independent mills of the country and the amount of money that would be necessary to purchase these independent mills so they could absolutely cut out these competitors. They were only stopped in this transaction because of the investigation that was put on by the Federal Trade Commission under Senate resolution referred to a few minutes ago. I want to quote Mr. Asbury, who represented the Southern Cottonseed Oil Mill in his testimony before the Federal Trade Commission in this investigation.

Especially were surveys made in Alabama, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Georgia. They listed all mills to be bought, and by so doing the number of tons of seed that would be available for these three mills per press per year, as well as the amount of money needed in each State to carry through their high-handed scheme.

LISTEN TO MR. ASBURY'S TESTIMONY

Mr. Asbury was asked this question by Mr. Wooden:

"With whom did you discuss these plans and surveys?

"Mr. ASBURY. I discussed the matter with Mr. Geohagan. He is the man who is most interested in working out these plans from a financial point of view and otherwise in our company. I also discussed these plans with Mr. Phil Lamar, who runs an oil mill at Rome, Ga., and with Mr. Palmer Brown, of the National Cottonseed Products Co., in Memphis, Tenn.

"Mr. WOODEN. Have you discussed it with the Buckeye and Procter & Gamble interests?

"Mr. ASBURY. Yes; I have discussed it with them; yes, sir.

"Mr. WOODEN. Have you discussed it with Swift & Co.?

"Mr. ASBURY. Yes; I was in Chicago last year and talked with the Swift people."

SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO. AS A LEADER

Mr. Asbury stated that these surveys and plans were drafted in the office of the Southern Cotton Oil Co. at New Orleans, and that Buckeye had made drafts and surveys also. The statements showed that in South Carolina they would have about 205,000 tons of seed to crush if they could get rid of the independent mills which would give these three companies 3,300 tons per press per year and the amount that would be needed to take over the independent mills in South Carolina would be $2,990,000.

In the case of Georgia, in taking over the independent mills it would give these three companies 2,600 tons per press per year, and to purchase the mills in that State it would take $3,050,000.

It was understood in Alabama that the Kidd Cotton Oil Mill interests were to join with the Southern, Swift, and Buckeye Co., because, as stated by Mr. Asbury, they could not buy out this company. These four companies would have 3,500 tons per press per year, and it would cost $1,660,000 to take over the Alabama independent mills.

LISTEN TO THIS QUESTION

"Mr. WOODEN. Why did you plan to take over the Allen and Dothan Mills and not the Kidd Mill?

"Mr. ASBURY. Well, I think it would have been easier to have bought them out than it would have been to get the Kidd one. Kidd has a hull plant; therefore, it would not have been easy to get his hull plant."

You will find Mr. Kidd was at the head of the Alabama division of the association at the time he was to be made a part and parcel of the price-fixing scheme.

THE TESTIMONY SHOWS THAT THEY HAD OPTIONS

"Mr. WOODEN. Did you talk to Mr. Lamar about these plans?

"Mr. ASBURY. I think Mr. Lamar got some options on mills in Georgia. (This was in 1929.)

"Mr. WOODEN. Did you have options, obtain options, on mills besides the ones Mr. Lamar obtained?

"Mr. ASBURY. Yes; there were options obtained on a number of mills."

"Mr. WOODEN. In other States?

"Mr. ASBURY. Yes.

"Mr. WOODEN. By whom were they obtained?

"Mr. ASBURY. I do not know. Mr. Geohagan handled that part of the matter.

"Mr. WOODEN. Did they get options on mills in South Carolina?

"Mr. ASBURY. I think; yes.

"Mr. WOODEN. Do you know who obtained these?

"Mr. ASBURY. My impression is that perhaps Mr. John Stephens did, but I am not sure.

"Mr. WOODEN. How was this whole matter to be financed?

"Mr. ASBURY. You are asking me a big question.

"Mr. WOODEN. You had your plans made, did you not?

"Mr. ASBURY. We were trying. We did not get that far. First, we had to find out or wanted to get some light on the financial side; that is, how much it would take to finance it."

CORPORATIONS WERE PLANNED

Mr. Asbury further stated that plans were formulated to form a corporation in each State to take over the independent mills.

ADDITIONAL TESTIMONY FROM THE HEARINGS

"Mr. WOODEN. The new corporations were to take over the mills that they would acquire?

"Mr. ASBURY. I think it was discussed to take over the mills and to organize the industry in the States on a basis that would enable them (the Southern, Buckeye, and Swift) to crush the seed in an economic way at a reasonable cost and on a basis that we could make money.

MR. ASBURY LETS THE CAT OUT OF THE BAG

"Mr. WOODEN. Are you familiar with anything relating to the taking over of the Marion Harper Cotton Oil Co.?

"Mr. ASBURY. I think Mr. Lamar, who later bought the Rome (Ga.) mill, had the Marion Harper Mill. We were satisfied with Mr. Lamar. He used to belong to our company.

"Mr. WOODEN. There were certain specific reasons for involving in the proposed plans the taking over of the Marion Harper Mill?

"Mr. ASBURY. I hardly know how to say this if it is going in the record.

"Mr. WOODEN. Can I help you out?

"Mr. ASBURY. Well, one reason is that Mr. Harper is a leading intermittent type of seed operator. I am telling you what I know, or rather what I think about it. When Georgia adopted the 'code of trade practices' Mr. Harper attended the conference. He remained and indicated his willingness to operate under the code. Mr. Harper says, 'I am for the code of trade practices.' He did not oppose it, yet he did not work under it and proposed to operate as he saw fit and in whatever way he could, buying seed at whatever price he could."

THE HARPER MILL WAS AN INDEPENDENT MILL

My friends, that is the attitude of all independent mills like Mr. Harper's. These mills are the ones that make the three large groups or mills pay a fair price for seed on a competitive basis. You will note also that Mr. Harper did not do what was intended in the code; that is, follow a set or fixed price by the State associations operating under the national association. Mr. Asbury further states: "Because of this I personally would prefer to have some one else run Mr. Harper's mills." Yes; Mr. Asbury and the three large mill operators mentioned in this deal would prefer that they take over all of the independent mills so that they would know that they would not have Mr. Harper's type to interfere with their plan of price fixing and highway robbery.

MR. ASBURY FURTHER TESTIFIES

"Mr. WOODEN. In other words, Mr. Harper was not disposed to cooperate with the remainder of the industry?

"Mr. ASBURY. I do not think it was a question of cooperation but a question of discrimination. My view is that I wanted to be able to look a man in the face and tell him that I am giving him the best price I can; also, telling him that I am dealing with him on the same basis that I am dealing with others (a fixed price).

"Mr. WOODEN. And you would also like to be able to say that he could not do any better at any other place?

"Mr. ASBURY. No."

But that is the position Mr. Asbury would aspire to. In fact, under the code indorsed by the Federal Trade Commission at Memphis last summer, Mr. Asbury and his outfit is just about in that position. They wanted to complete the job by buying the independent mills.

THIS COMBINATION PREFERRED TO PUT HARPER OUT

"Mr. WOODEN. But you would like to be sure of that?

"Mr. ASBURY. It is extremely difficult to do business in cottonseed or cottonseed oil for what the seed are worth. If I am buying cottonseed for $30 per ton and somebody else is buying for $31, the producer will naturally sell his seed to the man who pays the $31. I may be able to get along for a while. I will either have to pay $31 in order to get seed to run my mills or get out of the business."

Therefore, to keep the independent mills and independent buyers from making a competitive market by bidding up seed, they proposed to buy them out.

THIS WILL APPLY TO ALL INDEPENDENT MILLS

Mr. WOODEN. Isn't it a fact that this Marion Harper Oil Co. consistently tops the price of other mills?

"Mr. ASBURY. Yes.

"Mr. WOODEN. Is that not one of the reasons that the leaders in your groups in the business wanted to put them out?

"Mr. ASBURY. Yes. Personally, I would like to have somebody else running their mills."

Senator SMITH. Wouldn't it be very well if you, at this point, when you speak of the ability of an independent mill to dispose of its product in a manner that would enable it to give a better price for seed, to just give to the committee, for the benefit of those who are not familiar with it, what products they do dispose of, such as meal and hulls. The local community would absorb the greater percentage of their output other than oil, and at a minimum cost, because they would take it away on their wagons.

Representative FULMER. As stated a few minutes ago, they buy largely locally, trucking seed in and out. In the meantime all of these independent mills have to sell to these three refineries, and these three refineries are able to fix the price.

Senator CONNALLY. Have you any evidence that Mr. Humphrey himself approved this effort to suppress independent mills or to merge them with trust mills?

Representative FULMER. I prefer to leave that to Representative PATMAN, who is prepared to give you the facts along that line. But I wanted to show how the mills worked under the trade-practices rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you go further in the matter I think we should have more specific information as to the records of what was done in these conferences and Mr. Humphrey's connection therewith.

Representative FULMER. I would state that that took place in all these trade-practice conferences, and that the minutes of the conferences are in the office of the Federal Trade Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Did it happen in 1928?

Representative FULMER. Oh, no; not necessarily. They are having them continually now. They are calling the various industries together and conducting these trade-practice conferences and formulating this code of ethics, right along.

The CHAIRMAN. What specific facts would you like to show to the committee, or would you like to have us subpœna in order that we may get at the facts to which you refer?

Representative FULMER. I would just like you to take the report of the Federal Trade Commission in the hearings, and they will absolutely establish the facts to which I refer.

Senator KEAN. What hearing do you refer to?

Representative FULMER. Hearings on the cottonseed-oil industry. When the oil mills used to buy independently, as I mentioned a while ago, the mills would send out quotations from day to day.

The CHAIRMAN. We understand that, but if you will give us the dates when these conferences were held, or will tell us where to get the record or records of them, then we will see what we can do.

Mr. FULMER. The conference was held in 1928 at Memphis, Tenn., and the minutes and records are in the hands of the commission.

May I state that these conferences are usually called on account of some complaint on the part of the industry? After complaints are made the commission calls the whole industry together and holds these conferences. For instance, in this meeting the commissioner stated he was present to advise and assist in formulating the type of rules, regulations, and code of ethics, so that the industry would be able to eliminate competition without prosecution under the antitrust laws.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, as to that the records will best show the situation.

Representative FULMER. Yes.

Senator DILL. This was done in 1928?

Representative FULMER. Yes.

Senator DILL. Has there been any further conference to change rules that have proved objectionable?

Representative FULMER. No.

Senator DILL. Why not?

Representative FULMER. They are perfectly satisfied.

Senator DILL. Have not the people who object the right to appeal to the commission?

Representative FULMER. They have been doing this, and that is what I am trying to do at this time——

Senator DILL (interposing). With whom?

Representative FULMER. With the actual producers and sellers of cottonseed.

Senator DILL. I am talking about requests made to Government authorities.

Representative FULMER. No.

Senator HASTINGS. Have you made any protest to the Federal Trade Commission?

Representative FULMER. Yes. In fact, we have attended hearings, and we have had these hearings for the special purpose of bringing these matters out.

Senator WATSON. What hearings?

Representative FULMER. Before the Federal Trade Commission, investigating the cottonseed-oil proposition.

Senator CONNALLY. There is an investigation going on now, as I understand it.

Representative FULMER. I understand that these hearings are so damaging to the Federal Trade Commission, because of their indorsement, that they consider the resolution passed by the Senate does not require them to make a report. I am hoping the commission will be forced to make a report because the attorney in connection with the case is prepared to show you some astounding facts which will bear out my contention.

Senator FESS. I am terribly confused about this whole business. I was wondering whether it would not be more regular for us, since I do not know a thing about these trade conferences, to have a statement from Commissioner Humphrey, in order that we may know, first, what trade conferences are and why they are held, what they do in those conferences, so as to let us know just what the thing is that is being complained of.

Senator WHEELER. That was what I was trying to get a few minutes ago.

Representative FULMER. If you will let me conclude, I will only take a few minutes more.

Senator WHEELER. Let me ask you one question: You stated that there was some lawyer representing, was it, some of these independent mills who wanted to be heard on the matter?

Representative FULMER. No. I referred to the attorney representing the Federal Trade Commission in these hearings.

Senator CONNALLY. Do you mean the attorney for the Federal Trade Commission?

Representative FULMER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The investigation is not completed.

Senator SMITH. You said you had asked for a report.

Representative FULMER. Yes.

Senator SMITH. But I meant a full report as to what the commission did when this practice was set up, not subsequent to that meeting. Now, you could not get that report.

Representative FULMER. No. But we expect a report to be made of this investigation.

Senator WHEELER. From what investigation?

Representative FULMER. Of the cottonseed-oil industry by the Federal Trade Commission, so as to ascertain whether or not they have formulated a combination in the fixing of prices.

Senator BROOKHART. But you said there was an attorney ready to make a report. What is his name?

Representative FULMER. Mr. Wooden. May I state that just before these trade practices were adopted the mills had a way of sending out telegrams giving quotations on cottonseed to cottonseed buyers. But after the trade-practice rules were adopted, then every cotton State in the Union where cottonseed-oil mills are located opened a central office, at the capital; and when they quoted prices on cottonseed, telegrams were sent to every buyer representing every mill in that State, of identical wording and price. When they proposed to increase the price the same type of telegram was sent out from this central office, which represented all the mills. This will show you that there was no independence on the part of any mill, and no individual mill was even allowed to send out quotations. They had to abide by the quotations submitted through the central office.

I want to say further to you that a great many of the independent mills, as well as cotton ginners, had borrowed money from the large cottonseed mills, and they were absolutely fearful of making any statement, because they felt if they did their loan might be called.

Senator HASTINGS. At whose instance is this investigation being made by the Federal Trade Commission?

Representative FULMER. It is the result of a resolution offered by Senator Heflin, of Alabama, about a year ago and adopted by the Senate.

Senator HASTINGS. Would not that investigation bring out all the ills and all the complaints?

Representative FULMER. It will bring out largely the very thing I am giving to the committee now, except that you are going to have 10 or 12 volumes of testimony taken at the hearings, and nobody in the world will ever read them. I want to say to you that I have during the recess taken quite a lot of time in going through these hearings, but I am sure the attorney representing the Federal Trade Commission will be able to give you the high lights and the real facts in connection with this matter, which will, I am sure, bear my statement.

Senator HASTINGS. Will he recommend that something be done about it?

Representative FULMER. I am sure that he will not. It will be up to the Federal Trade Commission to do that, and I am satisfied they will not recommend anything, because they indorsed these particular trade-practice rules for the cottonseed-oil industry.

Senator HATFIELD. How do you know they indorsed these trade practices?

Representative FULMER. Well, it is shown by the records in the office of the Federal Trade Commission.

After completing my statement before the Interstate Commerce Committee, Mr. Humphrey was called upon for a statement in defending himself, and I want to quote the following from his statement, which is a further proof of the charges made by me:

I was not present when the cottonseed rules were adopted; I have never favored the cottonseed rules; I do not favor them now; I do not think that part of them are legal.

In the first part of my statement, I quoted Mr. Christie Benet in his statement before the trade-practice conference, Memphis, Tenn., in 1928, as follows:

It is not necessary at this time to go into detailed statement of the competitive set-up in the industry. We have known about this competitive set-up for years, but did not see our way out.

Since making this statement before the committee I have received a letter from Mr. Christie Benet wherein he complains because I did not quote the complete statement made by him. I am very glad to add his complete statement, which refers to the competitive set-up as quoted by me:

It is not necessary at this time to go into a detailed statement of the competitive set-up in the industry. It has been, and is, very acute, and naturally, dealing with so many hundreds of thousands of sellers and so many different conditions, there have grown up, maybe, bad practices. The industry was thoroughly conscious of this fact for years, but did not see its way out.

I am sure you will agree with me that in quoting Mr. Benet in the first instance before the committee that I did not do him an injustice because the complete statement is absolutely in line with what I quoted.

AUTOMOBILE USE RESTRICTIONS

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a statement from the Secretary of the Interior on the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I submit the following letters relative to automobile use restrictions in the Department of the Interior appropriation bill:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANT TO THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 10, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT H. CLANCY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CLANCY: Confirming your telephonic request, I am inclosing memoranda from three of the bureaus of this department regarding the limitation of $750 in the Interior appropriation bill for the purchase of automobiles.

In line with our conversation, I also desire to call attention to the limitation under contingent expenses, page 4, line 3, of the House print of the Interior appropriation bill for the operation of one passenger-carrying vehicle. We believe that uniformity between departments should prevail. The Agriculture appropriation bill, however, passed the House with provision for three passenger cars under this office of the Secretary—one for the Secretary, one for general-utility use in the department, and one for the Forestry Service in Washington. In addition, a passenger car was provided for at least one other bureau officer.

The Department of the Interior has only two passenger cars in Washington—one for the Secretary and one for general-utility use for the whole department. The amendment would deprive us of our general-utility car. No car is provided for the special use of any assistant secretary or bureau officer, as in the case of some other departments. The two cars now in use are in excellent condition, and the appropriation is only for their maintenance. No funds are requested for purchasing new cars to replace them. The Department of the Interior is already far below the quota of cars for all other departments, except the State, and a 50 per cent reduction as proposed would further increase the inequality and deprive us of a car for legitimate needs. The value of time consumed by officers of the department in making official trips during office hours would more than offset the few dollars required annually to operate an automobile to facilitate their official travel.

Sincerely yours,

E. K. BURLEW,
Administrative Assistant and Budget Officer.

Inclosures.

FEBRUARY 1, 1932.

Memorandum for Mr. Burlew:

This refers to inquiry concerning the provision in the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture limiting the delivered cost of a passenger-carrying automobile to $750, including the allowance for a used car when involved.

The practice in the Indian Service is to buy cars of a lightweight class, principally Fords and Chevrolets. Now and then bids are received on cars with a list price in excess of the Ford or Chevrolet, but when turn-in allowances and freight are considered it may be possible to award the bids for one of these other makes. However, all specifications call for cars in the lightweight class. During the last fiscal year only one car out of the lightweight class was purchased, and that was for the superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes at Muskogee, Okla. A Chrysler costing a little over $1,000 was purchased for him.

A limitation of $750 would possibly discriminate against the principal lightweight manufacturers. A very recent case at Shoshone, Wyo., shows the factory prices of the Ford and Chevrolet four-door sedan automobiles as $484.15 and $471.03, respectively. The cars to which the prices apply have the usual equipment, including bumpers but no spare tire and tube. If a purchase should be made for the Carson School, Nev., the costs would be as follows:

	Ford	Chevrolet
Weight.....pounds..	2,587	2,685
Factory price	$484.15	$471.03
Freight, Government bill of lading	269.82	273.98
	753.97	745.01

It will be seen that the provision limiting the expenditure to $750 would in this instance discriminate against the Ford Co., in that it would be possible to buy a Chevrolet but not a Ford.

If the limitation of $750 was exclusive of freight and turn-in allowances, so far as the Indian Service is concerned there would be no difficulty, but it is not believed wise to have such a limitation if freight and turn-in values are to be included.

SAMUEL M. DODD, Jr.,
Chief Finance Officer.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
February 1, 1932.

Memorandum for the Secretary:

With regard to the inquiry as to the effect upon the work of the Geological Survey of the proposed amendment to place a limitation of $750 upon the price that can be paid for passenger-carrying automobiles:

Such a limitation would restrict purchases to the Ford, Chevrolet, and perhaps one or two other makes. In many districts where Survey activities are conducted such cars are reasonably satisfactory and, indeed, are now used. (On December 31, 1931, the Survey's passenger-carrying vehicles numbered 140, of which 80 were Fords and Chevrolets.)

However, in certain areas and certain types of work the use of somewhat better cars is essential for real efficiency and economy. The oil, gas, and mining supervisors in the mineral-leasing work in Western States, and some of the district engineers in water-resources investigations must cover great territories at high speed over very poor roads or in some cases over country without actual roads. Travel throughout the year in all kinds of weather and frequently through heavy mud or deep sand, in country where service stations are very far apart, requires cars of greater ruggedness and greater power. Cars of the Oldsmobile, Dodge Bros., and Studebaker type answer these requirements at a final cost per mile little, if any, greater than that of the lighter cars. The benefits of the sturdier cars are very real in the greater amount of work accomplished by the personnel, and hence the lessened cost of that work. Territory can be covered faster; trips of 200 to 400 miles a day can be accomplished without exhausting the workers, who can thus accomplish more. Moreover, the extra power assures prompt arrival at their destination, and the greater stamina prevents frequent delays for repairs that are so costly to the time of personnel. Trips must be made at definite times, for a burning well or mine, a wild gas or oil well, a proper water shut-off or water pollution by oil-field and mine refuse require prompt attention, and hurried calls are frequent. Many of the cars are driven 20,000 or even 30,000 miles a year in this kind of service, which is ruinous to the light cars and difficult even for the cars now used that cost up to $1,200. There is no doubt that a very real economy is involved in permitting continuation of purchase of the medium-grade cars by raising the limitation to $1,200, for otherwise any initial saving in purchase price would be quickly offset by higher cost of maintenance and far more than offset by the loss in work accomplished.

Furthermore, it is feared that the proposed legislation (as worded in the amendment to the Agricultural Department bill, as it passed the House) will invalidate the present authorization for the use of personal cars in official work. (Act of Feb. 14, 1931.) From the point of view of the Geological Survey (especially the water-resources branch), such restriction would be very serious. At present, for example, in a single district of that branch four official cars may be available. In times of flood or other emergency, including perhaps the temporary disabling of one or two of the official cars, three or four personal cars may be forced into use for a few days. This legislation (which would prohibit the use of cars not used exclusively for official business) would make necessary the purchase of sufficient additional official cars to provide for emergency needs, though these extra cars might stand idle a large part of the time. This would, of course, largely increase the investment in passenger-carrying automobiles and the annual cost of depreciation.

W. C. MENDENHALL, Director.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, January 30, 1932.

Memorandum for Mr. Burlew.

A limitation of $750 for a completely equipped passenger automobile would in the case of the National Park Service be a severe handicap.

The national parks and monuments are located in widely separated areas, and most of them are in remote locations at high altitudes in heavy mountainous country. Many of the parks cover large areas, and since they are located in heavy mountain country the travel from one point to the other within the park is circuitous and requires long trips to carry on the park work at all places within the park. At present many of the park roads are steep, rough mountain roads requiring cars of rugged construction and well powered to negotiate them.

On account of the location of the parks and monuments, generally far from outlying centers of population and supply, it is necessary for the park officials to travel by automobile for long distances in carrying on official business. Public transportation is not available with direct routing and schedules to make their use economic. Some of the park superintendents have the administration of more than one area, which requires them to get back and forth to these areas in as short a time as possible.

For the greater portion of the work in the parks where passenger-carrying cars are needed the car must be built for rough usage over rough, steep mountain roads, and it is necessary at times on these trips to carry four or five people with their baggage for overnight stops. The car must be large enough to carry the load without overloading. It must be exceptionally well constructed, so that it will not be weakened by hard usage and soon reach a poor state of repair. On practically all of the trips which the park superintendents and his officers make in the parks and to points outside of the parks the trip and work connected with it require long hours, if anything is to be accomplished in a reasonable time. At the very best, these trips are hard on the occupants even when made in a reasonable-sized car, and when long trips are made in a light automobile the physical strain is more than one can stand and at the same time carry on the work which has occasioned the trip. The high altitude and steep grades and heavy loads require a car with plenty of power and entirely reliable mechanism. The cheaper cars shake to pieces and early become in poor repair, and repair garages are few and far between on the roads over which the park officials travel, and servicing is very expensive and involves a great loss of time.

There are a number of general field officers in the National Park Service whose duties require that they not only travel frim park to park but that they cover a considerable area within the parks which they visit. These officials are on extended trips and carrying considerable baggage and ofttimes equipment. The distances traveled are so great that comfortable transportation becomes a necessity if the official is to be in any condition for work when he arrives at his destination. A rugged, well-powered, closed car of comfortable wheel base is not only required but is an actual necessity.

In writing up proposals for the purchase of cars the National Park Service generally specifies to meet the requirements of the Government a car of sufficiently long wheel base and design to permit long distances to be covered with comfort. It is also provided that the car must be well powered to negotiate steep grades, ranging as high as 20 per cent, and rough roads in high altitudes, carrying a heavy load. Also it must be of rugged construction and of good materials so as to be dependable during hard usage. It would be impossible to secure this type of car, completely equipped, delivered ready for operation for not to exceed $750. At the present we are being allowed $1,200, which is the minimum amount found to be necessary to buy cars meeting our needs.

A. E. DEMARAY,
Acting Associate Director.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Henry L. Stevens, jr., national commander of the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, our national defense is of such vital importance I desire to call attention by inserting in the RECORD an abstract of an address by Henry L. Stevens, jr., national commander of the American Legion, before the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, which I had the honor to attend, at Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., on the evening of February 1, 1932. This abstract is as follows:

God knows I like to think of this Legion of ours as a great, magnificent, and splendid host, dedicated unselfishly and undeniably to the finest and best interests of America. So I say to you that when your fathers and forefathers builded here this great, fine Nation; when those pioneers hewed a pathway through woods and over obstacles to establish out yonder in the far West that great empire, pouring out in many instances the sweet, red wine of youth; we must think to ourselves of the insecurity of all this great material wealth.

It was only eight or nine years ago, as I recall it, that our great American fleet, the splendid Navy of the United States, was taken out to sea and literally scuttled. Now we are 20 per cent behind the program of the London treaty. Remember, too, that in the construction of every battleship 80 per cent goes toward labor and only 20 per cent toward the actual material, and such construction would relieve the unemployment situation to a certain extent.

The Legion is not asking for a big Navy, but the Legion is begging, believing that we know the facts, that our sea power, that thing upon which we depend to repress an invading foe, should be adequate, that it should be sufficient to safeguard your interests and protect your home and to keep unsullied the respect for that flag for which we fought.

And the poor old Regular Army—simply reduced to the point where they are only a group of highly trained technicians, men who in time of another war would become the higher commanders and the Army professors upon whom would be built a great Army from the people, those people who were once, and who still are patriots of the most intense sort. They are men upon whom our country relied, and rightfully so, generation after generation—some of the finest gentlemen of whom America can boast to-day, but now passed on, not any longer the first line of defense but simply technical instructors. The National Guard, if you please, has become America's first line of defense.

There is now a threat to cut down the Army appropriation which, if it occurs, would demoralize the entire National Guard from Maine to California.

When you hear any news of that kind I beg of you people to contact your Representatives in the Senate and the House and say to them that you are not militaristic, that you love peace—God knows, men who have seen and experienced the horrors of war hope and pray that war may never come again—but if there is an emergency we do want our country to be reasonably prepared to meet that emergency.

Inefficiency and lack of time and training caused the deaths of hundreds and thousands of men who rest now beyond the western horizon. To bring it home to you concretely, do you know that if you would lay the head of one to the feet of the other of those boys that were killed back in 1917 and 1918 that an angel might tread on those human corpses for a distance of 50 miles without ever touching foot to the ground? That is a pitiful thing. That is a thing that shall never occur again if the Legion is able to get across to the country the full and fair and plain facts as it sees them.

The American Legion's attitude on national-defense matters is one of patriotism that was born in the war service of its men and women, and it likewise is a pledge to keep faith with those who died or suffered for their country's welfare.

And you recall, I know, with me to-night with pleasure the opportunity for service that began 13 years ago when our millions of young men, your sons, your brothers, husbands, and your fathers and sweethearts were privileged to be mustered out of what we knew then and loved as the great American Army and Navy. Assembled there were men from every walk of life, brought there without regard to religious preferment or social position or political affiliation, or any other one sectional avenue of approach, but brought there as American citizens.

Out of those great fighting forces was born the American Legion, composed of that same fine high type of men. We brought back not only the strong and able-bodied men who had been privileged to fight side by side throughout that war. We brought back others, men who came home human wrecks. There were men who came home weakened in strength, in mind and body, incapable of self-support, without the power to provide a living for those who were depending upon them. There were men who were suffering from the pangs of war; men who had perhaps overtaxed their patriotic impulses and had laid to a great measure upon the altar of service the fullest and greatest measure of their inward devotion.

Those people were suffering and they had no beds upon which to lie and bear their pain. They had no medical assistance with which to cure themselves. No medicines were available. This great group of strong men, known as the American Legion, banded themselves together in Paris, foreseeing just such an emergency as this, and laying our case before the country, presented it to the Congress of the United States.

Here and there upon some pleasant hillside, or down in some happy valley, great, tremendous hospitals began to be erected, and now dotted throughout the land we find them from the length to the breadth of our magnificent country memorials of the service, the unselfish devotion, the everlasting affection that our well comrades had for those less fortunate buddies that we had the honor to serve with on the battlefields of France. That is the Legion's tribute to faithfulness; that is the thing for which we were dedicated in our service to God and to country.

Equally close to our heart and the burden of love that we will forever carry with us is the duty that we owe to their orphan children. On the hillsides of France, thousands upon thousands of graves stretch themselves in systematic lines, labeled with crosses or with stars. There sleeps a soldier, and beside him sleeps the heart of some American woman, be it wife, sister, daughter, or mother. In every grave that you see there upon the green hillsides of France rest the souls at least of two people, an American soldier and an American woman.

And they have left us a heritage, those dead souls, so to speak—the care and protection of their little boys and girls. And I like to think in terms of my own little boy when I talk about child welfare; I love to think about this great Legion of ours standing as a bulwark against future trouble in case that I was called to the Great Beyond and had to leave him here without friends or without protection.

Those little people who have been denied the guiding hand of a loving father, those little children whose little footsteps have no leadership, oh, isn't it comforting to know that we have an organization that places a strong hand in that little tender hand to guide those little footsteps down the straight pathway of Americanism out into the broad fields of American citizenship? In what higher calling, what more noble enterprise, could strong American men and women be engaged?

They expect it and they have a right to expect it, and you don't know, perhaps, how they look up to you and to me as their elder brothers and their elder sisters. If you did, perhaps, if you saw the things that I have seen during this little part of this year, your heart would melt and go out in gratitude for the honor and privilege that you have of serving them.

With the memory of our dead comrades ever fresh in our hearts and minds, with the ever-present suffering of other comrades for whom the war will never end, with the distress of their dependents ever before us the American Legion only keeps faith with those who gave the most in the protection of our country in the great emergency when it begs of the American people to be adequately prepared in order that future suffering may be avoided and that the institutions and homes for which we fought may be well guarded.

My friends, we do believe in national defense. We are asking the country for an adequate Navy and for an adequate Army. They do good in time of peace, just as much as they do good for their Nation in time of war. Everywhere throughout the land the Army is carrying on school, teaching better citizenship; and so is the Navy, for that matter. And I beg of you that you carry back to your people this message of national defense that I have tried in my humble way to present to you to-night.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS TO SIT DURING THE SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I ask unanimous consent that the committee or a subcommittee thereof be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

THE LEADERSHIP OF PRESIDENT HOOVER

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a speech of The Assistant Secretary of the Navy delivered at Faneuil Hall, at Boston, on January 25.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of Hon. Ernest Lee Jahncke, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Faneuil Hall, Boston, Mass., on occasion of the Forty-first Annual Meeting of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, 8 o'clock, evening of January 25, 1932:

To me it is both an honor and a pleasure to address the Republicans of Massachusetts, the State that has given so much to the Republican Party and to the Nation—given of its best in leadership and in statesmanship, in loyalty, and in patriotism.

Massachusetts, the cradle of American liberty and fountain of American culture; the home of my own beloved chief, distinguished descendant of an illustrious Bay State name, the Hon. Charles Francis Adams, Secretary of the United States Navy.

I come to you to-night as a Republican and as a member of the Republican National Committee.

I am here to discuss politics, practical politics. I am here to discuss the present national situation primarily as it bears upon the forthcoming presidential campaign.

As the campaign draws swiftly to the foreground the national political picture comes more clearly into focus. Issues and personalities each day are thrown into sharper relief and clearer outline.

Briefly, we have on the Republican side the record of one of the greatest Presidents of American history, the man who has piloted the ship of state through the most disturbed era in our peace-time history—Herbert Hoover.

On the other side, we have an as yet unnamed candidate—one of a dozen men now discussed—backed by the activities of the Democrats during these years of depression.

On the first Tuesday of November of this year the public must choose between these two. That choice may be a decisive factor in the future history of our people.

We Republicans face the verdict of the American people with every confidence of a renewed assertion of faith in Herbert Hoover and the Republican Party.

We rest our case upon the calm and considered judgment of a people whom a century and a half of self-government has taught to distinguish the true from the false, the demagogue from the statesman, the political trickster from the patriotic leader.

Mr. Hoover is the leader and the standard bearer of the Republican Party, but first and foremost he is President of the United States, and he has consecrated all of his great talents to that task in the interest of every American citizen regardless of creed or party.

Endowed with courage, leadership, intelligence, and experience he has lavishly and without thought of self poured out these gifts upon the altar of the common welfare of these United States.

Undeterred by a torrent of partisan abuse, he has gone on with his tasks, rejecting the false panaceas, seeking the wisest counsel, the surest methods, and the most able leaders in his supreme task of rehabilitating the greatest nation in the world.

From the beginning the President has had a definite program for the future as well as the present. Recently he submitted to the Congress a definite outline of his economic program to restore normal conditions.

The policies which it includes were formulated after complete discussion not only with his official advisers and the leaders of both branches of Congress but also with leading citizens from every walk of life.

This program is unique in our history. It is the greatest domestic economic plan ever presented to Congress by a President. It provides for relief of distress among the unemployed by organization and coordination of local authorities with the President's Unemployment Relief Organization.

It includes further assistance to employment through the organization of business in coordination with the administration program.

The strengthening of the Federal land-bank system in the interest of the farmers.

Assistance to home owners through the creation of a system of home-loan discount banks.

Relief to depositors in closed banks so as to assure early distribution of funds now out of circulation.

Enlargement of the discount facilities of the Federal reserve banks under full safeguards in the interest of a more adequate credit system.

Creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to ease credit tension and to stimulate our economic system.

Likewise the President's program embodies assistance to the railroads by the formation of a credit pool and by other measures, thus affording security to the bonds held by our insurance companies, savings banks, and other benevolent trusts, thereby protecting the interest of every family.

Further, the President urges drastic economy, the maintenance of public finance on a sound basis, with expenses held to an irreducible minimum until our economic recovery is complete.

He has pointed out the inevitability of an increase in taxes and urged that the burden be so distributed that it may be borne in proportion to the ability to pay among all groups and in such fashion as not to retard our recovery.

The President has resolutely and steadfastly opposed the dole in any form and under any disguise. And in his economic program he vigorously upholds the maintenance of the American system of individual initiative and individual and community responsibility.

This is the fifteenth depression through which our country has passed in the last hundred years, but it is the first time that the Nation's Chief Executive has ever been called upon to supply the brains, energy, and direction to turn the faltering wheels of business, to create jobs for millions and to mobilize the American people to fight the greatest peace-time battle the world has ever known.

Leaders of industry, finance, and commerce have turned to Herbert Hoover to solve their problems. The States and their Representatives in Congress have appealed to the President.

The representatives of agriculture and labor and business have taken their troubles to the White House and petitioned aid.

In every case the President has accepted each additional task.

He has labored longer and harder, denying himself rest and relaxation, dedicating himself to the conquest of the economic evils besetting the Nation.

He gave stimulus to business and created jobs through the expansion and acceleration of public construction.

He organized the States and municipalities in the same work and obtained the cooperation of the public utilities and other private interests to carry on expanded building programs.

By Executive order the President stopped immigration, thereby preventing a half million or more immigrants from being added to our unemployed or from displacing American citizens.

The President established a nation-wide chain in which every county and every community is a link for the care of the unemployed and unfortunate by individual effort.

He went to the assistance of the farmers in 21 States who were afflicted by the drought, and a system of loans was provided which enabled them to rehabilitate themselves.

To help our entire credit structure in this time of strain the President directed the mobilization of the financial forces of the country in a credit pool of $500,000,000.

Briefly told, these are a few of the things the President has undertaken involving domestic matters for the welfare of the American people.

With the same purpose in mind, Mr. Hoover has given his assistance and counsel in remedying international complications which affect this country and the world adversely.

He provided the leadership in bringing about the London naval treaty designed to stop competitive armament.

He intervened to save Germany from a catastrophe which would have had dire repercussions throughout Europe and the United States. He brought about a new era of friendship and good will between this country and the nations of Latin America.

So colossal has been the leadership of our President that the peoples of a depression-ravaged world have sent their emissaries of State and their ambassadors of business and finance to join our own representatives in consulting the one man who has shown the courage, the energy, the intellect, and the ability to meet and conquer the forces of depression.

You have heard a great deal of Democratic criticism of the President from the stump and over the radio.

Certain of their leaders have repeatedly attempted to place the blame for the depression and for national and international evils upon the shoulders of Mr. Hoover.

This unjust and unreasonable criticism of a President who has taken unprecedented action to relieve the economic situation and who has initiated the only constructive steps toward the restoration of normal conditions has brought serious protests from many people throughout the land, irrespective of political affiliation, who believe that this campaign of abuse on the part of some of the Democratic leaders is entirely unfair and uncalled for.

Democracy, through its leaders, solemnly pledged that if they were elected they would take immediate steps to remedy the so-called extortionate features of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act.

Many of you may remember hearing an occasional Democratic speaker declare that our tariff law is a monstrosity and a wicked abomination and a number of other things which the Democrats would be glad to remedy as soon as given the chance.

No Democrat ever really specified what was the matter with the tariff or what the extortionate rates were except my good friend, Senator PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi, who felt that the 7 cents a pound duty on long-staple cotton was all right, but was rather dubious about the value of any tariff on corn.

But there was a general unity among the Democratic cheer leaders that the tariff was wrong and that they could make it right. Now, in the Democratic House of Representatives they have produced a piece of tariff legislation.

This bill doesn't pretend to lower rates, and it doesn't embody any constructive features, and its doesn't specify what duties are too high, and its enactment would not make a single change in the Hawley-Smoot law as it stands to-day.

It is a covert attack on the principle of protection and in that it is truly representative of the time-honored Democratic policy of free trade.

But it isn't necessary for me to analyze or demonstrate that the Democratic tariff attitude is packed full of insincerity and hypocrisy.

Consider all the abuse hurled at this bill for nearly two years by practically every prominent Democratic leader, and then listen carefully to the words of Representative RAINEY, Democratic floor leader of the House, on January 16, 1932. I quote:

"Lower this tariff? You will not do it, and we do not dare do it with conditions as they are. * * * We do not want this market flooded with the products of cheap labor in other countries."

Mr. RAINEY spoke quite frankly in this statement, and he spoke truly. The Democrats don't dare attempt to lower the rates in the tariff because they now realize, as the Republicans have always contended, that any lowering of our tariff walls at a time like this would invite a deluge of foreign products under which the American economic scheme would be imperiled.

There is another feature of this tariff bill introduced by the Democrats in the House. There is a provision which calls upon the President to invite foreign nations to attend a world tariff parley.

In other words, our Democratic friends, not satisfied with advocating tariff reduction by American citizens, are now eager to take this purely domestic policy over the seas to some international conference and let the producers of other countries tell our producers what they can pay their workers and what standard of living shall prevail in America.

In view of this, their attacks on the alleged internationalism of President Hoover are ridiculous.

Arthur Brisbane, famous journalist, expounded a purely Republican doctrine when he commented on this scheme as follows:

"The Democrats want a 'world parley' on the tariff. The greater part of the world is increasing its tariffs, and the maximum of futility has been shown to be a 'world parley.'

"We should have a tariff made for the United States without consulting anybody, planned as intelligently as possible, to protect workers, manufacturers, and business men in the United States."

Now, I should like to refer briefly to the recent Jackson Day dinner:

Seriously, this convocation of the best minds of Democracy had a very important phase which we can not overlook. The addresses of the three distinguished defeated Democratic candidates for the Presidency were broadcast over national networks.

The three speakers set forth their party's "constructive program" after three years of invective and bitter criticism. The American people were at last enabled to hear the other side of the Democratic story. They at last had an opportunity to judge what Democracy could offer in the way of national leadership.

Alfred E. Smith, John W. Davis, and James M. Cox, orators of the Democratic Party and the survivors of the Republican landslides of 1928, 1924, and 1920, offered their respective solutions of the economic difficulties of the country.

The three standard bearers had no criticisms to offer of the administration's vast program except that they disagreed with the Republican principle of tariff protection, and yet none had the courage to point out a single schedule in the tariff law which he would reduce.

Former Governor Smith urged a Federal bond issue. In almost the same breath he called for a reduction of taxes, but failed to explain how the bond issue could be retired without increasing the tax burden.

Former Governor Cox urged a balanced budget, but failed to mention in so much as a single sentence how the Democratic Party hoped to arrive at this desirable state.

Former Ambassador Davis, in his sole reference to an economic remedy, pleaded for the Republican policy of levying taxes upon those best able to pay them.

Such is the consummation. The essence of Democratic philosophy, the carefully ripened fruit of Democratic economic wisdom. A bond issue to increase the Government's obligations and the taxes on the people. A budget to be balanced by Democratic sleight-of-hand, and an increase of taxes in the higher brackets.

On one thing the speakers seemed to agree—that we should maintain an isolation policy toward Europe.

How strange this sounds falling from the mouths of statesmen who followed where Wilson walked, and especially strange happening at practically the same time when the Speaker of the House and his Democratic colleagues were advocating a world parley to discuss the question of our tariff laws.

Can anyone who listened to the expositions of these leaders of the Democratic Party find in their program a single item that would be of benefit to the people of America?

It has frequently been stated with a considerable degree of truth that any voter can find an outstanding leader among the gallery of ex-Democratic candidates who will agree with him on something.

Each of these lost leaders by inference speaks for his party. But it is a fact that the Democratic Party to-day is a party without leadership.

The Democratic Party is to-day, as it has been for 70 years, the party of opposition, of criticism and faultfinding, without constructive ideas and without constructive leadership.

As between our President and the entire field of aspirants for the nomination Herbert Hoover stands head and shoulders above them all. The Democratic story is the same to-day as in 1928, 1924, and 1920—denunciation and criticism.

This year, however, the Democrats list as an asset a most important political and psychological factor. I refer to the unfair, purely emotional, and unreasoning sentiment which has resulted from the depression.

From the house tops Democratic orators have shouted that the economic situation is a Republican responsibility, even though practically everyone is now aware that the depression originated in a world condition far from the American shores and beyond control of American statesmen.

What would a Democratic President have done that Herbert Hoover has not done?

What do the Democratic leaders propose to-day that has not been anticipated by the President?

What additional proposals have they which appeal to the thinking people of the United States?

It is my most sincere belief that Herbert Hoover is the best-equipped man we could possibly have had in the White House to meet this crisis.

And I believe you will unhesitatingly agree with me when I say that had any other man been President, Republican or Democrat, one of his first acts in the face of the economic emergency would have been to send for Herbert Hoover to help solve the problems facing the Nation.

In this time of national and international stress our President has produced the only real leadership the world has known.

His incumbency of the Presidency adds luster to the distinguished record of statesmanship which has been the contribution of the Republican Party to the people of America.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech and statement made by my colleague from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by my colleague from New York [Mr. BOYLAN]:

[New York Herald Tribune, December 20, 1931]

BOYLAN WANTS CONGRESSIONAL RECORD JAZZED—NEW YORK REPRESENTATIVE WOULD USE HEADLINES, CARTOONS, AND COMIC STRIPS—EVEN A GRAPHIC SECTION—ASKS BOARD OF NEWSPAPERMEN FOR RECOMMENDATIONS

By Grace Phelps

WASHINGTON, December 19.—If Representative JOHN J. BOYLAN, of New York, had his way, this is how the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would have looked one day last week:

Extra! Extra! Clash on moratorium in House—Republican accuses President of treason—uproar and tumult follow MCFADDEN denunciation of Hoover—CHIPERFIELD defends Chief—both sides cheer when Alabama Democrat says "Charges don't come from us."

To Representative BOYLAN'S way of thinking, the RECORD bears the weight of the accumulated dullness of 58 years, and it is time Congress brightened it up with headlines that would tell the story of the speeches and events in the House and Senate so that "he who runs may read." Photographs, cartoons, and even comics should be daily features of the "diary of the representatives of the people," with a well made-up "roto" section, perhaps once a week, to give added pictorial information to the folks back home about doings "on the Hill."

That is, this would be the result, he hopes, if Congress passes his resolution, introduced last week, to employ a committee of experienced newspaper men and women to look into the matter for a commission of Senators and Representatives.

WANTS PICTURES AND HEADLINES

"People don't have time to read speeches," Mr. BOYLAN said, warming up to his subject. "Maybe they had time 60 years ago, but this is an age when we must get our information in capsule form if we are to get it at all. And no matter how interested a person may be in the proceedings in Congress, no one nowadays has time to wade through the close-printed pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If he did, he would ruin his eyesight. Why, it takes a microscope to read the fine type in which letters and quotations are printed. Besides, the make-up is atrocious. There are no headings to indicate when one subject is finished and another taken up.

"Pictures and headlines would tell the story a hundred times better than a column speech. And I mean to keep hammering away on this resolution until something is done to redeem and modernize the RECORD. I admit that the proposed change is revolutionary. But I also suggest that there is more wit and wisdom in many a cartoon or even a comic strip than in most congressional orations I have read in the RECORD.

"A comic strip, for instance, could illustrate both sides of the proposed sales tax. Take the comic, 'Mr. and Mrs.' Joe and the Missus could be arguing over her getting a new gown. Finally, he gives her the money to get it. She buys the gown but has to pay a sales tax. She asks Joe for the extra money when she comes back. He says it was a luxury, all right. She says it was a necessity. And so the argument goes on and on 'far into the night.'"

Cartoons, according to Mr. BOYLAN, might be a bit more difficult. To make sure, however, that strict impartiality would be preserved, he would have the RECORD employ a Republican cartoonist and a Democratic cartoonist who could lampoon the members of the opposite party on alternate days or alternate pages, as the party caucus might decide.

The administration—even a Democratic administration, as Representative BOYLAN confidently expects soon—would have no chance to dictate the policies of the modernized RECORD. The paper would be run by newspaper men and newspaper women (for Mr. BOYLAN is nothing if not gallant) who would be as impartial as newspaper men—and newspaper women are well known to be. There would be no editorials in the new RECORD and—except perhaps for an appendix which might be provided as the morgue for spellbinders who insisted on a final resting place for their oratory—speeches would be limited to half a column of direct quotation.

TRIED TO GET CARTOON IN RECORD

"I am serious about this proposal," Mr. BOYLAN protested. "Two years ago I made a speech about a mother of 10 children, who was about to be sentenced for life for a minor offense—her fourth one—against the dry laws. I tried to get a cartoon printed in the RECORD that depicted the horror of that law, but Majority Leader TILSON said, 'It simply isn't done.' I could describe the cartoon but I could not get it printed in that dry-as-dust publication.

"Here in Washington the papers told the story of the Mapes attempt last week to make the District of Columbia support the Federal City. Pages of the RECORD were given over to the debate. But a few headlines and a cartoon or two would have told the story to the country at large so that the whole Nation would have known what was happening. I should like to have seen headlines in the RECORD like this:

"District target for revenue sharks—Bill to mulct voteless residents of Capital passes House.

"Then in opposite columns, say, I'd have subheads something like this:

"District defended by BOYLAN, BURTNESS, and LAGUARDIA—MAPES and STAFFORD say District shirks taxation."

CONVICT LABOR

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a letter signed by myself and Senator HAWES on the Cooper-Hawes prison goods bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter sent by Senator HAWES and myself to Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, with reference to the provisions of the Hawes-Cooper prison goods bill:

Mr. WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor,
American Federation of Labor Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GREEN: As coauthors of the Hawes-Cooper bill, approved by President Coolidge on January 19, 1929, and designated as Public No. 669, Seventieth Congress, we submit at your request our views as to the extent and purposes of this bill, the intent of Congress in passing it, and the scope of authority of the States in the enactment of legislation under it.

There are more than 120,000 prisoners in State institutions, this number growing at a rapid rate, the products of whose labor present a problem increasingly important in the conduct of penal institutions throughout the country.

We have received numerous inquiries concerning the Hawes-Cooper bill and the power of the States under that bill. It is manifest that some confusion exists as to the meaning of the law, and such confusion tends naturally to increase the perplexities of the problem presented to each State in legislating for the future.

With 48 State legislatures considering the prison problem during the current year and the two subsequent years prior to the taking effect of the Hawes-Cooper Act, it may be well to clear up some of the misapprehensions.

The Hawes-Cooper bill does not go into effect until January 19, 1934. The 5-year period between the date of its approval and the date of its effect was written into the bill by Congress to give to each State ample time in which to adjust prison affairs.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION

Something should be said of the history of this legislation.
